FOREWORD

The social life in ancient India has not yet received the same attention as the other aspects of ancient Indian history and culture. Only caste has been studied with some care, and from the legal point of view, some other aspects of social life also. But what Zimmer in his Altindisches Leben has done for the early Vedic period, still remains to be done for the subsequent ages of Indian civilisation and culture. However, before a synthetic history embracing the long period, through which Indian society has grown and developed, is attempted, an intensive study has to be made of the different ages through which it has come. It was with this object that I took up the study of Vātsyāyana's Kāmasūtra which gives a beautifully vivid picture of Indian society in the early centuries of the Christian era. It wonderfully supplements the account we receive from the sacred literatures, Brahmanical, Buddhistic and Jain. Dealing with an avowedly secular matter as it does, it depicts society from an independent point of view, and gives details, especially of the darker features of social life, with a fulness that we naturally miss in the sacred texts.

An indispensable preliminary was an accurate determination of the time when Vātsyāyana wrote his book, especially as in the history of Indian literature there are very few definite dates. I have therefore first of all discussed this question at some length from internal and external evidence. My paper on the date of the Kāmasūtra was first published in the Journal of the Bihar and Orissa Research Society in 1919, and again, after a thorough revision, in the Journal of the Department of Letters (Vol. IV) of the University of Calcutta. The conclusions arrived at by me have been confirmed by the discussions that my paper has raised, both in India and in Europe, and I have reviewed them towards the end of Chapter I. Prof. A. B. Keith in his recently published History of Sanskrit Literature, shows himself inclined to bring down my date by about two centuries, but he has not fully set forth his reasons for thinking so.

Vātsyāyana delineates many local customs—deśyopacārāḥ—as he calls them, characterizing the various peoples of India inhabiting the different parts of its wide area. I have, therefore, thought it necessary, while passing in review the customs peculiar to each province or people to fix the location of the countries about which there have been controversies among scholars ; this matter has therefore been treated, with some fulness, in Chapter II of this book. It first appeared in the Annals of the Bhandarkar Institute (Vols. VII and VIII).

The rest of my book attempts to give as complete an account as possible of the social life of India as depicted by Vatsyāyana, and I have shown how he sometimes corroborates, and very often supplements, the account derived from other sources, specially from works written about his own time, so as to present a fairly accurate idea of the state of Indian society in the period to which Vātsyāyana belongs. Much of the matter contained in Chapters V and VI appeared in the Sir Asutosh Mookerjee Silver Jubilee Volumes (Vol. III, Part I) under the caption Sidelights on social life in Ancient India : Studies in Vātsyāyana's Kāmasūtra.

The only contributions on the social life of the age of Vātsyāyana that appeared before my studies, are two papers by Prof. P. Peterson referred to in Chapter VI (P. 172). These are mainly translations with short notes of two out of the sixty-four sections of the Kamasutra and cover only a very small part of the ground traversed by me.

CHAPTER I

DATE OF THE KĀMASŪTRA

Vātsyāyana stands pre-eminent in early Indian literature as an author who brought the analytical power of a keen logician to bear on the science of erotics which, in our modern days, has only lately begun to be studied with the care that it deserves. The science had attracted the serious attention of the Indian savants very early, as far back, perhaps, as the time when the Sātapatha Brahmana was being compiled, and in the centuries that elapsed before Vātsyāyana made his appearance, the various sections of the science were being studied separately and individually. But it was Vātsyāyana who synthesised the whole science and revived the popular interest in this branch of knowledge. Apart from its interest as a work on the science of love, Vātsyāyana's Kāmasūtra, at the present day, is of immense importance to us as throwing a flood of light on the manners and customs of his contemporary Indian society. To appreciate the full value, for the social history of India, of the picture that Vātsyāyana presents, we must, in the first place, try to ascertain, as closely as possible, the time when he flourished and for this purpose it will be necessary to trace the history of his science, to ascertain his relation to other departments of Indian literature, and also to analyse critically the few references that may be gleaned from his work, to the political history of India.

Vātsyāyana's Reference to Earlier Works on the Science of Love.

In speaking of the origin of the Kāmasūtra, Vātsyāyana says at the beginning of his work¹ that at first, Prajapati, the 'Lord of Beings,' for the welfare and preservation of his progeny composed a huge encyclopædia in a hundred thousand chapters dealing with the three objects of human life, viz., Dharma, Artha and Kāma; the first two of these subjects were next taken up by Manu and Brhaspati respectively and Nandī the attendant of Mahādeva, took up the third which he dealt with in a thousand chapters. This last work was condensed into five hundred chapters by Śvetaketu, the son of Uddālaka. The work of Śvetaketu was further abridged into a hundred and fifty chapters and divided into seven sections by Bābhravya, a native of the Pāṇcāla country. Next, Dattaka, at the request of the

1. Vide Chapter I of the Kāmasūtra, pp. 4-7 of the Benares edition. The quotations from the Kāmasūtra have been made throughout from the Benares edition, edited by Pandit Dāmodarlāl Goswāmī and published in the Chowkhamba Sanskrit Series and the references are to the pages of this edition. The Sanskrit text edited by Mahāmahopādhyāya Pandit Durgāprasāda of Jaipur had been published earlier, but the Benares edition is more easily accessible to the public, the Jaipur edition being meant for private circulation alone. There is also a Bengali edition of the text and the commentary with a Bengali translation, published by Babu Mahes Chandra Pal of Calcutta. There is some difference in the arrangement of the chapters; otherwise the readings are much the same with only occasional variations.

2. This agrees with what is said in the Mahābhārata, Śāntiparva, Ch 59, with regard to the origin of the sciences. Here we are told that at the request of the gods who were filled with anxiety at the entire absence of discipline among mankind, Prajapati Brahmā produced from his own intelligence a hundred thousand chapters in which were delineated Dharma—the science of religion and duty, Artha—the science of politics and economic and Kāma—the science of love.—

यत्र धर्मस्तथैवार्थः कामश्चैवाभिवर्णितः ॥२६॥

But there is no agreement as regards the subsequent development except that in the Mahābhārata also Bṛhaspati is one of the authors of Dandanīti or Arthasāstra.

courtesans of Pāṭaliputra, wrote a separate treatise dealing with the Vaiśika section of Bābhravya. His example was followed by six other writers—Cārāyana, Suvarṇanābha, Ghoṭakamukha, Gonardīya, Goṇikāpura and Kucumāra, each of whom took up a section of Bābhravya and wrote a monograph on it. As the science treated in this fragmentary fashion by numerous writers was about to be mangled and spoiled and as the work of Bābhravya, being huge in bulk, was difficult to be mastered, Vātsyāyana proposes to give an epitome of the whole subject in a single work of moderate dimensions. Towards the end of the Kāmasūtra, again, Vātsyāyana says that having mastered the significance of the sūtras of Bābhravya (from his teachers, as one would do in the case of a sacred text or śāgama) and having pondered over them in his mind, he composed the Kāmasūtra in the approved method.¹ He thus admits that the great work of Bābhravya formed the groundwork of his own book as is also quite evident from the frequent references that he makes to it in every part of his Kāmasūtra : one out of his seven sections, the Sāmprayogika, covering about a fourth part of the whole work, is entirely taken from Bābhravya, as he says at the end of that section.² There can, therefore, be no doubt that Vātsyāyana had before him the great work of Bābhravya Pāñcāla. The commentator also quotes several verses stating the opinions of the followers of Bābhravya, and about a sūtra of Vātsyāyana he observes that it is a verse of Bābhravya;¹ he seems, therefore, to have access to some treatise specially belonging to Babhravya's school.

It may be noted that Vatsyayana speaks of having treated Bābhravya's book like an ugama, a work of holy scripture, indicating that it was considerably ancient. A Bābhravya who is called Pancala by Uvata, the commentator, is mentioned in the Ṛk-prātiśākhya as the author of the Krama-pāṭha of the Ṛgveda and Professor Weber² holds that this Babhravya Pañcāla, and the Pañcāla people through him, took a leading part in fixing and arranging the text of the Ṛgveda. The Mahābhārata also says that the author of the Kramapāṭha was a Pañcāla of the Bābhravya gotra and that his proper name was Gālava.³ This connection of the Pañcāla people with the Ṛgveda receives a confirmation from what Vātsyāyana tells us in connection with the sixty-four varieties of Samprayoga or connubial intercourse. He says that they belonged to the Pañcāla country and were

Besides, the commentator quotes eight verses—Bābhraviyāḥ Ślokaḥ—at pp. 37-38. Moreover, he introduces the sūtra सुरतान्ते सुखं पुंसां, etc. (p. 81) with the remark अमुमेवार्थं बाभ्रव्यगीतेन श्लोकेनाह । collectively called *Catuhshashṭi*¹—"the sixty-four"—from analogy with the Rgveda. He avers that the Rks collected in ten mandalas are called the Catuhshashti (being divided into eight Ashṭakas of eight chapters each) and the same principle holds in the case of the Samprayogas too (as they are divided into eight times eight varieties); and besides, because they are both connected with the Pancala country, therefore, the Bahvrcas, the followers of the Rgveda, have out of respect given this appellation of Catuhshashṭi to them.² It may be noted here that the followers of Bābhavya (Bābhaviyaḥ) are mentioned in the Mahabhashya (on Pāṇini I. 1) but we cannot be certain whether a Vedic school or a Kāmasāstra school is there meant. If Bābhavya, the author of the work on the Kāmasāstra is the same as the great author of the Kramapāṭha, then he has to be placed in a very early age indeed. But Bābhavya is merely a gotra or family name and it may be doubted whether the science of erotics could have been systematized so early; though it must be admitted that erotics and eugenics, the sciences that the Kamasutra embraces in its scope, had received particular attention from the Rshis at the time of composition of the hymns of the Atharvaveda, many of which deal with philtres and charms to secure love and drive away jealousy, with the means for obtaining good, healthy children and other allied matters.

The Pancala country where Bābhavya flourished appears to have been the part of India where the science of erotics was specially cultivated. We have seen how great was the debt of Vātsyāyana to Bābhravya Pañcala, specially with regard to the section dealing with Samprāyoga, the subject-matter proper of the Kāmasūtra. Some of the most revolting ceremonies in the Aśvamedha sacrifice seem to have originated in the Pañcala country.¹ The Pañcala people were evidently credited in ancient times with special knowledge in matters relating to the sexes, and one of them is said to have changed even the natural sex, as we see in the case of Śikhandin, the son of the Pañcala king, Drupada.² Polyandry as we see it in the case of Draupadī Pañcala, may be regarded as an ancient institution of the Pañcala country and the Paṇḍava brothers, belonging as they did, to the allied tribe of the Kurus, as we see from the common Vedic phrase Kuru-Pañcala,³ were certainly familiar with it and could have no difficulty in acceding to it; in fact, the Kurus of Hastinapura and the reigning dynasties in North and South Pañcala are said, in the Purāṇas, to belong to the same stock and to be descended from the same great ancestor Bharata. In this connection, a statement of Vātsyāyana is very significant. He says that according to the followers of Bābhravya, who belonged to Pañcala, as we have seen, a woman's chastity may not be respected when she is found to have intimacy with five lovers⁴ (in addition to her husband, explains the Commentary) showing that five was considered as the limit beyond which it was not proper for a woman to go; if she did so, she could be approached with impunity by any one. The Commentary explains that in the case of Draupadī this limit was not passed, as Yudhishthira and others were all her husbands.¹ The indulgence shown by the Pancala people to five lovers, appears to be significant. It is difficult to see in it a symbolic meaning as is done by Dahlmann. It is worthy of remark in this connection that Āpastamba from whom, as we shall presently see, Vātsyāyana quotes several aphorisms, refers to the bestowal of a single woman in marriage to a whole family.²

Of the predecessors of Bābhravya mentioned by Vatsyayana, the earlier ones appear to be mythical, but Svetaketu, the son of Uddalaka, is better known. He is mentioned in the Mahabharata as having established a fixity in sexual relations which before him were entirely free and promiscuous like those of the lower animals, the institution of marriage having not yet come into existence.³ This refers to a primitive stage of society, and it is hardly possible, I am afraid, that this Svetaketu Auddalaki could have been the author of the work in five hundred chapters referred to by Vatsyayana. However, in the Chāndogyopanishad, and in the *Satapatha Brahmana in the portion called the Brhadāranyakopanishad, we meet with a Śvetaketu who may be connected with the tradition of the authorship of a work relating to the Kāmasūtra. Here we find three generations of Vedic teachers, Brahmapas of Kurupancala—Aruna, his son Uddālaka Āruni, and his grandson, Śvetaketu Auddalaki Aruṇeya.¹ A story is told in almost the same words in both the Chāndogya as well as the *Bṛhadāraṇyaka Upanishads*² how the young Śvetaketu, after finishing his education, went to the assembly (samiti or parishad) of the Pañcāla people and was there discomfited by some questions put to him by Pravahana Jaivali, a Kshattriya; he was mortified at thus being nonplussed by a mere Rājanya and complained to his father who also being unable to answer the questions, sought Pravahana Jaivali himself for being taught in the matters broached by him. Among the matters taught by this Kshattriya of Pancala we find a symbolic interpretation of the relations between the sexes.³ A few chapters later in the Bṛhadāraṇyakopaniṣad,⁴ we find the same thing related with further additions including rules for approaching a woman, for dealing with a lover of one's own wife and specially rules for obtaining good progeny, and Uddālaka Aruni is there referred to as one of the foremost teachers of this science⁵ which represents some of the earliest attempts made in India for the discovery of eugenic laws. These matters were afterwards more fully developed in the Gṛhyasūtras but the beginnings were made in the Upanishads, and, in fact, Āśvalāyana in his Gṛhyasūtra refers to the upanishad or the secret lore as the proper source in these things.⁶ It is significant that both Pravāhaṇa Jaivali and Uddālaka, of the Upanishad story, belonged to the Paucāla country where, as we have seen before, the Kamasāstra was specially cultivated. From what we have said above, it is evident that Uddālaka considerably advanced the science the rudiments of which he had received from Pravahana Jaivali, and his son, Svetaketu, must have carried it still farther as is evident from the body of tradition that has accumulated round his name as the first human founder of the Kāmasāstra which appears to have been specially studied in his family. There can be no doubt that Svetaketu and his father were historical personages and lived in a highly cultured age, an age of intense philosophical speculation, as we see from the many stories connected with them in the Brāhmanas and the Upanishads and it is not improbable that he had composed an Upanishad or secret work in which matters relating to marriage, love and the begetting of children were specially dealt with; at any rate, a body of eugenic rules of which a few fragments have been preserved in the Brhadaraṇyakopanishad, must have come down from him and his family. That Svetaketu left behind him some such work may be gathered from the fact that a personal statement by him has been quoted by Apastamba in his Dharmasūtra where Svetaketu is represented as having said that even after his marriage he carried on Vedic studies at his teacher's house for two months every year and thus acquired a greater knowledge of the Śruti than before,¹ and we may note that this passage which seems to be a direct quotation from Svetaketu, has not been traced as yet in any of the Vedic works where he is referred to. Apastamba further states, in another chapter, that though Svetaketu was a person belonging to a comparatively recent age, yet he had become a R̥shi.¹ Coming back to Vātsyāyana we find that the opinions of Auddālaki are referred to by Vātsyāyana in three places² in his Kāmasūtra and in one of them he contrasts the opinions of Auddālaki and Bābhravya, thus proving the connection of Auddālaki with the Kāmasāstra beyond any doubt. It does not, however, necessarily imply that Vātsyāyana had access to Auddālaki's work in five hundred chapters, as in that case he would have made ampler use of it; certain opinions must have been current in Vātsyāyana's time among the teachers of the Kāmasāstra (whom he frequently refers to as the Ācāryas), as having come down from the reputed human founder of the science; or, the legend of Auddālaki and his opinions might have been taken from the work of Bābhravya on whom Vātsyāyana mainly depends.

The monographs written by the successors of Bābhravya,—Dattaka and others—are quoted by Vātsyāyana in the respective chapters of his book. Dattaka's book on the courtesans appears to have been in use in the eighth century A.C. when Dāmodaragupta wrote his *Kuṭṭanīmatam*³ and it may have been availed of by the commentator who quotes a sūtra of Dattaka where Vātsyāyana has translated the substance of it.¹ Of the other writers, Gonardiya has been quoted by Mallinātha in his gloss on Kumārasambhava, VII, 95, and on Raghuvamśa, XIX, 29, 30.

Rājasekhara in his *Kāryamīmāṃsā*² refers to Suvarṇanābha as the author of a treatise on a branch of poetics, viz., Rītinirṇaya and speaks of Kucumāra as having dealt with the Aupanishadika section. The latter is evidently the same as Vātsyāyana's Kucumāra, the author of a monograph on the Aupanishadika portion of the Kāmasāstra, and most probably one and the same work has been referred to by the two authors, there being nothing extraordinary in the fact that the sections dealing with the secrets and mysteries (upanishad) of both poetics and erotics should coalesce.³ Kauṭilya in the Arthasāstra has quoted Dirgha Cārāyaṇa and Ghoṭamukha who, as Professor Jacobi holds,⁴ are probably the same persons as the Cārāyaṇa and Ghoṭakamukha of Vātyāyana; they would therefore have lived prior to the fourth century B. C. and Dattaka and Bibhravya who preceded them must be thrown back to a much earlier date. Dattaka of course, could not have lived earlier than the fifth century B.C. when Pāṭaliputra became the capital of Magadha. Gopikāputra is mentioned by Patañjali in the Mahābhāṣya as a former grammarian⁵ and Professor Jacobi is inclined to believe that he is the same person as the Gonikāputra of Vatsyayana. But in his case, as also in that of Gonardīya, the identification is rather doubtful as grammar and erotics are not very allied subjects. The works of Bābhavya and Goṇiputraka, who must be the same as our Gonikaputra, as well as that of Vatsyayana, appear to have been used by Jyotirīśvara Thakura while composing his Pancasāyaka,¹ a work on erotics which was written in Mithilā by the end of the thirteenth century, the author being considered to be the great-grand father of the celebrated poet, Vidyāpati who flourished in the middle of the fourteenth century A.C.

The Upper Limit of the Date of Vātsyayana from the Authors quoted by him

Vātsyāyana has quoted freely from the works of earlier authors not only in his own subject, but in other departments of Sanskrit literature as well. But while he has taken care to mention the authorities whom he cites and discusses when referring to his predecessors in the science of erotics, in the other cases he has not cared to acknowledge his debt by mentioning the sources. Some of them may, however, be indicated, and we shall be enabled thereby to fix a terminus a quo for him on literary grounds.

There is a wonderful agreement between Vātsyayana and the Kalpasutra of Apastamba. In Chapter I on the selection of a bride (Varana-vidhana-prakaranam) the Kāmasutra has सुप्तां रुक्तां निष्क्रान्तां वरणे परिवर्जयेत्. This is exactly the same as that given by Āpastamba in his Grhya-Sūtra, I. 3. 10.² The next two sūtras show only slight modifications, but making allowance for differences in reading they are exactly identical. Vātsyāyana has

सांकरिकीं राकां फलिनीं मित्रां खनुजां वर्षकरीं च वर्जयेत् ।

दत्तां गुप्तां घोतामृषभां शरभां विनतां विकटां मुण्डां मडूषिकां
सांकारिकां रानां पालां मित्रां खनुजां वर्षकारीं च वर्जयेत् ॥ ११ ॥

नक्षत्रनामा नदीनामा वृक्षनामाश्च गर्हिताः ॥ १२ ॥

सर्वाश्च रेफलकारोपान्ता वरणे परिवर्जयेत् ॥ १३ ॥

The next sūtra of Vātsyāyana again reads exactly the same as Āpastamba's Grhyasūtra, I. 3. 20. यस्यां मनश्चक्षुषो- र्निबन्धस्तस्यामृद्धिर्नेतरामाद्रियेतेत्येके.

The first sūtra of the next chapter of the Kāmasūtra is again the same as in Āpastamba's Grhyasūtra, III. 5. 8. The Kāmasūtra has संगतयोस्त्रिरातूमधःशय्या ब्रह्मचर्यं क्षारलवण
वर्जमाहारः ; Āpastamba reads विरात्रमुभयोरधःशय्या ब्रह्मचर्यं
क्षारलवणवर्जनं च.⁴

About the sources of the Dharma also, Vātsyāyana shows a wonderful agreement with Āpastamba, but this time with his Dharmasūtra. Vātsyāyana after giving a definition of Dharma says that it should be learnt from the Vedas and from the assembly of those who knew the Dharma,¹ just as he says that the Kāmasūtra should be learnt from the books on the subject and the assembly of the citizens.² Apastamba says much the same thing in his Dharmasūtra.³

In another chapter, Vātsyāyana quotes a verse referring it simply to the *Smṛti*⁴ (smṛtitah)——

वत्सः प्रसूतवने मेध्यः श्वा मृगग्रहणे शुचिः ।

शकुनिः फलपाते तु स्त्रीमुखं रतिसंगमे ॥

This verse is found in the Dharmasūtras of *Vasiṣṭha*⁵ and *Baudhāyana*⁶ with very slight and immaterial variations. With some further modifications it is found in the Saṃhitās of *Manu*⁷ and *Vishnu*⁸ also. Its occurrence in almost identical forms in so many works shows that it must have been borrowed from some common and ancient authority on Dharma. Again, in a verse in his chapter on marriage, Vātsyāyana shows an agreement in idea with Baudhāyana. Vātsyāyana says that as mutual affection between a couple is the object of all forms of marriage, therefore the Gāndharva form which has its basis in love, is easier to celebrate, and is free from the technicalities of a long wooing, is the best of all ¹ and Baudhāyana refers to this as the opinion of some authorities.² This idea we also find in the Mahābhārata.³ From the above, it is clear that Vātsyāyana has embodied in his work at least five sūtras from the Grhyasūtra of Āpastamba, though we cannot feel quite certain with regard to his debt to Baudhāyana. We are not quite sure about the date of these sūtra works, but the period to which this Vedic literature belonged, is supposed to have extended to about 500 B.C.⁴

Next, we find that Vātsyāyana has embodied in his book a considerable number of passages from a work whose date is more definitely known, viz., from the Arthasūtra of Kauṭilya ⁵ which is now generally considered to have been written about 300 B.C., and he has followed the method of Kauṭilya throughout the Kāma-sūtra. This has led to the absurd identification of Kauṭilya with Vātsyāyana and a host of other authors in some of the Koshas or lexicons ⁶

See also, A Note on the Supposed Identity of Vātsyāyana and Kauṭilya, by Mr. R. Shamashastry, in the Journal of the Mythic Society, Vol. vi pp. 210-216

Coming down to still later times, we observe that Vātsyāyana quotes from the Mahābhāṣya of Patañjali. The latter observes with regard to unavoidable faults or defects in grammatical definitions, that simply because certain defects cannot be avoided, one should certainly not desist from formulating rules of interpretation (paribhāṣās) or from giving a definition, just as one does not refrain from cooking his food merely because there are beggars to ask for a share of it, nor from sowing barley-grains simply for the reason that when the plants grow up there may be deer to destroy the corn. Vātsyāyana says the very same thing in exactly the same language with regard to defects inherent in Kama or desire. This quotation from the Mahābhāṣya brings down the upper limit of the date of Vātsyāyana to the second half of the second century B.C., in round numbers to circa 150 B.C.

Besides the above there are many references to narrative literature in Vātsyāyana's Kāmasūtra. In one passage,² he says that when a girl shows some signs of listening favourably to the proposals of a lover, she should be propitiated by reciting to her such stories as those of Ahalya, Avimaraka and Sakuntala. The story of Ahalya is given in the Ramayana about the date of which, however, there is much controversy; but Ahalya is also alluded to by Asvaghosha in Buddhacarita. Avimaraka's story forms the subject matter of one of the dramas of Bhasa whom some scholars have placed about the middle of the first century B. C. while others would assign him to the third century A. C.¹ In any case there could not have been much distance in time between Bhāsa and Vātsyāyana because we find pictured in the works of the dramatist a state of society very closely resembling that depicted in the Kāmasūtra. We cannot be sure, however, that Vātsyāyana derived the story of Avimāraka from the drama because Bhāsa's treatment of it seems to indicate that it was a well-known story like that of Udayana ; and, besides, the commentary, Jayamaṅgalā, gives some particulars that are wanting in the drama.

The story of Śakuntalā is referred to by Vātsyāyana in another place also. In his chapter on the courtship of a maiden, he says that the wooer should point out to the girl courted the cases of other maidens like Sakuntalā who situated in the same circumstances as herself obtained husbands of their own free choice and were happy by such union.² This refers to the story of the love between Śakuntalā and Dushmanta as we know it from the great drama of Kālidasa, but Vātsyāyana was certainly not indebted to him for it ; it is given very fully in the Mahābhārata.³ Asvaghosha in the Buddhacarita also narrates how Viśwāmitra, Śakuntalā's father, was led astray by an Apsaras whom, however, he calls Ghṛtāci instead of Menakā ; in his Saundarananda-kāvya also, the same author speaks of Kanva who brought up Bharata, the son of Śakuntalā, and he says further that the young son of Dushmanta displayed great skill in sporting with the beasts of the forest.¹ In his *Sūtralangreat kings of India.² He was evidently well acquainted with the story of Śakuntala. The Kaṭṭhahari Jātaka certainly reminds us of the story of Dushmanta and Śakuntalā.³ The legend, however, was known in still more ancient times, viz., the period of the composition of the Brāhmana portion of the Vedas. While we observe that Śakuntalā's mother, Menakā, is known as an apsaras in both the White and Black Yajurvedas,⁴ Śakuntalā herself is spoken of in the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa⁵ as having

there the son of Duṣshanta, and even the Śatapatha Brāhmana quotes the legend as having been sung in gāthās ¹ connected with the great hero who gave his name to the whole continent of Bharatavarsha; so that the legend appears to belong to the earliest stock of legends of the Indian Aryans.

Besides the above mention of certain well-known stories, there are many references throughout the work of Vātsyāyana to love-stories in general, showing that story-telling was very popular in the days of our author; and when we are reminded that the enormous mass of narratives in the Mahavastu, Divyavadāna and Asva-ghosha's Sūtralankara on the one hand, and the Sānti and Anuśāsana Parvas of the Mahabharata on the other, as well as those in the Tantrākhyayika, were mostly embodied in their present form about the early centuries of the Christian era, we feel inclined to think that it was in this period when narrative literature flourished most in India, that his treatise on love was composed by Vatsyayana who found the recital of love-stories the readiest means of rousing the tender passion in the hearts of maids and swains.

The Lower Limit of the Date of Vātsyayana from References to Kāmasūtra in later Literature.

We may now proceed to fix the terminus ad quem for the date of Vātsyayana from an examination of the references to his work in later literature, and for this purpose we shall take into account only those that will be immediately helpful to us. In the first place we observe that the great Kālidāsa was well acquainted with the Kāmasūtra. In describing the dalliance of the voluptuary Agnivarṇa who reminds us so much of the Kāṇva Devabhūti, Kālidāsa has often followed in Canto XIX of the Raghuramāsa, the description in the Kāmasūtra, using even its technical expressions, e. g., the word sandhayaḥ which is used in verse 16 in the very same sense as that given by Vātsyāyana in his chapter on Viśrñapratibandhāna.¹ In verse 31, however, there is a more definite and verbal agreement. Vātsyāyana in his chapter on the means of knowing a lover who is growing cold (Virakta-pratipatti) gives as one of the indications of such a one मित्रकृत्यमपदिश्य अन्यत्र शेते.² Kālidāsa in describing Agnivarṇa under similar circumstances uses the very same language — मित्रकृत्यमपदिश्य पार्श्वतः प्रस्थितं तमनवस्थितं प्रियाः. Another very striking agreement has been pointed out by Mallinātha and dilated upon by modern scholars. Describing the marriage of Aja and Indumatī, Kālidāsa says that when the two touched each other's hands, the hair on the bridegroom's forearm stood on end and the maiden had her fingers wet with perspiration.³ Here Mallinātha quotes Vātsyāyana who speaks exactly the same thing happening under the same circumstances.⁴ In Kumārasambhava VII. 77, however, Kālidāsa has

1 Kāmasūtra, Ben. ed., p. 327 ff.

2 This is the reading given by Mallinātha. The Kāmasūtra reads मित्रकार्यमपदिश्य, etc., Ben. ed. p. 328.

3 आसीद्वरः कण्टकितप्रकोष्ठः स्विन्नाङ्गुलिः संवदते कुमारो ।

4 “कन्या तु प्रथमसमागमे स्विन्नाङ्गुलिः स्विन्नसुखी च भवति । पुरुषस्तु रं माञ्चितो भवति ; एभिरनयोर्भावं परीक्षते ।” This passage, quoted by Mallinātha is slightly different from the reading in the printed editions of the Kāmasūtra where we have स्विन्नकरचरणाङ्गुलिः स्विन्नसुखी च भवति, Benares edition, p. 266.

reversed this order, saying that it was Hara, the bridegroom, who persphied and the hair stood on end on the bride's hand. ¹ But the language is almost the same and we think Kālidāsa's memory did not serve him quite right when he wrote the Kumārasambhava passage and that he improved himself, as Professor Jacobi holds, in the Raghuvamśa. The violation in the one case only proves more strongly that Kālidāsa had a knowledge of Vātsyāyana's work and made use of it. Arguing from a similar agreement in another passage of Kālidāsa, Dr. Peterson has come to the definite conclusion that Vātsyāyana is quoted there by the poet. He refers to the following verse (in Act IV) which is considered to be one of the best in his Abhijñāna Śakuntalam. ²

शुश्रूषस्व गुरुन् कुरु प्रियसखीवृत्तं सपत्नीजने

भूयिष्ठं भव दक्षिणा परिजने भोगेष्वनुत्सेकिनी
यान्त्येवं गृहिणीपदं युवतयो वामा कुलस्याधयः ॥

Dr. Peterson then goes on to say : "The first, third and fourth precepts here are taken verbally from one sūtra, the second occurs elsewhere in our book ; the third we have already had. Scholars must judge : but it seems to me to be almost certain that Kālidāsa is quoting Vātsyāyana, a fact, if it be a fact, which invests our author with great antiquity." ³ It will be observed from an examination of the corresponding sūtras of Vātsyāyana ⁴ that in the first two lines of the verse quoted above, Kālidāsa has translated the ideas of Vatsyayana but in the third line he has followed our author verbally. On the authority of this agreement evidently Mahamahopadhyaya Hara Prasad Śastri has also expressed the opinion that Kālidāsa's "knowledge of the Kāmasāstra was very deep indeed."¹ Dushmanta's words in Act V of Śakuntalā—"नागरकवृत्त्या शान्तयेनाम्" shows that Kālidāsa has used the word nāgaraka there in the full sense imparted to it by Vātsyāyana in his section called Nāgarakacittam, viz., a city-bred man skilled in speech and love-making. There is moreover, a set of sūtras in Vatsyayana's chapter on Kanyā-viscrambha which reminds the reader at once of the first act of Kalidasa's Sakuntala as will be seen from the translation here given : "When a girl sees that she is sought after by a desirable lover, conversation should be set up through a sympathetic friend (sakhī) who has the confidence of both ; then she should smile with head bent down ; when the sakhī exaggerates matters, she should take her to task and quarrel with her ; the sakhī, however, should say in jest, 'This was said by her,' even when she has not done so ; then when the sakhī is set aside and she is solicited to speak for herself, she should keep silent ; when, however, this is insisted upon, she should mutter sweetly, 'O no ! I never say any such thing' in indistinct and half-finished sentences, and she should, with a smile, cast occasional side-long glances at the lover, etc."² From what we have said above, there can be no doubt that the Kāmasūtra was known to Kālidāsa and that he made verbal quotations from the work. Now Kālidāsa could not have lived later than the middle of the fifth century A.C., because he places the Hūnas on the banks of the Vamkshū, the Waksh or Oxus in Bactria,¹ before they had been pushed towards the west or towards the Indian frontier.² In all likelihood Kālidāsa lived during

1 The passages of Kālidāsa referred to here are verses 67 and 68 Āgastyaśāstra canto IV, beginning—विनीताध्वमस्तस्य वंक्षुतीरविचेष्टनैः. In the Journal of the Bihar and Orissa Research Society (Vol. II, p. 35 ff. and 391 ff.) Mahamahopādhyāya Haraprasād Sāstri has sought to place Kālidāsa about the middle of the sixth century A. C. depending on the garbled reading of Mallinātha who reads Sindhu instead of Vamkshū in the line quoted above. With all due deference to the great authority of Pandit Sāstri I would venture to differ from him here. There cannot be the shade of a doubt that Vamkshū is the correct reading here and not Sindhu. Vallabhaśa of Kashmir, who lived about five centuries earlier than Mallinātha, reads Vamkshū and the unquestioned genuineness and reliability of Vallabha's text as compared with that of Mallinātha has been fully established in the case of the Meghadūta where all those verses that had been accepted by Mallinātha as genuine but had been rejected as spurious by modern critics like Pandit Jvarachandra Vidyāśagara, Goldsmister and Stenzler, are found to be absent from the text of Vallabha. The superiority of Vallabha's text thus established in the case of Megha lūta applies with equal force to the Āgastyaśāstra. To an editor like Mallinātha living in the far south in the fourteenth or fifteenth century, Vamkshū or Vakshū, a river in Bactria was an unfamiliar, outlandish name and he had no hesitation in substituting for it Sindhu which was nearer home, forgetting though that it would have been geographically absurd for Āgastya to have marched northwards from the Persian frontier and met the Hūnas on the Indus. It is significant again, as has been shown by Professor K. B. Pathak, who first drew pointed attention to Vallabha's reading (Ind. Ant. 1912, p. 265 ff. and the introduction to his Meghadūta) that Kshīrasvāmin who lived about four centuries earlier than Mallinātha speaks in his commentary on the Amarakośha, of Bactria as the province that is referred to in this passage of Kālidāsa; this shows that so late as the eleventh century, Bactria through which the river Vamkshū or Oxus flows was considered to be the country where Kālidāsa placed the Hūnas. Vamkshū is a well-known river in the Mahābhārata (V. Sabhāparva 51. 26). Moreover, an examination of the variants given in Mr. G. B. Nandargikar's splendid edition of Āgastyaśāstra shows that Ānandavardhana, Sumatīvijaya, Dinakara, Dharmadatta and Vijayagani, in fact, most of the great old commentators, follow Vallabha, and adopt the old reading.

2 M. Chavannes has shown from Chinese sources that the Huns had won great power in the basin of the Oxus towards the middle of the fifth century A. C. (Document sur les Toukous (Göktürk), pp. 222-3). We do not know yet exactly when the Hūnas settled themselves in the Oxus valley. But there can be no doubt that the Hūnas were known in India even before the time mentioned by M. Chavannes. The Lalitavistara, thought to have been written about three hundred the reigning period of Chandragupta Vikramāditya in the early years of the fifth century A.C.. Varāhamihira who unquestionably lived in the sixth century A.C., has in his Brhat-Saṃhitā certain chapters, specially two, named Kāndarpikam and Puṃstrī-Samāyoga,¹ in which he has dealt with matters falling within the sphere of the Kāmasāstra and in them he seems clearly to have availed himself of Vātsyāyana's work though he nowhere mentions his name.

The author of the Kāmasūtra is mentioned by name in the Vāsavadattā of Subandhu who is supposed to have flourished about the same time as Chandragupta Vikramāditya, viz., at the beginning of the fifth century A.C.² While describing the Vindhya mountains, Subandhu says: "It was filled with elephants and was fragrant from the perfume of its jungles, just as the Kāmasūtra was written by Mallanāga and contains the delight and enjoyment of mistresses."³ Thus from the evidence offered by Kālidāsa and Subandhu we can feel definitely certain that the Kāmasūtra was written before 400 A.C.

The name Mallanāga referred to by Subandhu is the proper name of the author of the Kāmasūtra, Vātsyāyana being his gotra or family name as pointed out by the commentator and as is corroborated by some of years after Christ (Dr. Winternitz, Geschichte der Indischen Literatur, Band II, p. 200) mentions Hūna-Lipi as one of the scripts learned by the young Siddhārtha (Lalitavistara edited by Dr. S. Lefmann, Vol. I, p. 128; LA. 1913, p. 266). Besides, Dr. J. J. Modi has shown from an examination of passages in the Avestā that the Huns were known in Persia as a wandering or pillaging nation not later than the seventh century before Christ (R. G. Bhāṇuṅgar Commemoration Volume, pp. 71-76). It stands to reason therefore that the Huns should be known to the Indians also, especially since their occupation of the Oxus valley seeing that Bactria was very well-known to Vātsyāyana and was considered a part of India so late as the sixth century A.C. when Varāhamihira wrote his Brhat Saṃhitā.

the lexicons. Two branches of the Vātsa-gotra to which our author belongs are mentioned by Asvalāyana in his Srautasūtra,² and in the history of Sanskrit literature, there are two great representatives, besides our author, of this family : one of them is the great poet Bāna, who in one of the introductory verses to his Kādambari speaks of his grandfather as a scion of the Vātsyāyana family,³ and the other is the author of the Nyāyabhashya. This latter has sometimes been identified with our author as in the verse from Hemacandra's Abhidhānacintāmaṇi quoted before⁴ ; but we have seen that Hemacandra in the same passage identifies our author also with Kauṭilya, Cāpakya, or Viṣṇugupta who, we definitely know, preceded him by several centuries. The long period that separated these authors from Hemacandra has made him lose the historical perspective and his opinion in this connection does not deserve much consideration. Another argument based on internal evidence may be urged in favour of the identity of the two Vātsyāyanas. The Kāmasūtra defines Kama or desire as the consciousness of the enjoyment of appropriate objects through the five organs of sense (and especially through the organ of touch) controlled and directed by the mind associated with the soul.⁵ Now, this is exactly the position held with regard to the method of direct perception or- pratyaksha expounded in the Nyāyasūtra as well as in the Bhāṣya. The Bhāṣyakāra in his comment on Nyāyasūtras I. 1. 4 and 9, and I. 2, 20-27 makes it sufficiently clear that it is the Ātman or soul that receives perception with the help of the mind acting through the senses upon objects.¹ This identity of view of the two Vātsyāyanas with regard to experience or perception is no doubt true, but it will be observed that this view is held also by other schools, for example, the earlier Vedānta. The Kāthopanishad lays down in unmistakable terms that it is the soul that enjoys things acting through the mind and the senses, and the Bhagaradgītā upholds the same doctrine.² Brahmasūtra, II. 3. 18 (or 19 according to Rāmānuja) also appears to support the Upanishad view as shown by almost all the commentators.³ It is only Śaṅkara who in his comment on Brahmasūtra, II. 3. 29⁴ attempts to prove that pleasure and pain are the qualities of buddhi or intellect; but with regard to the Vyavahārika or Samsāra stage with which we are concerned in the Kāmasūtra, there is not much ground of difference even with Śaṅkara. It will be observed, therefore, that the doctrine of perception adumbrated by the Kāmasūtra, does not particularly belong to the Nyāyabhāshya but was very generally held among the philosophical schools at the time that our Sūtra was written, and this identity of view does not necessarily imply an identity of authors. Then again, the two Vātsyāyanas appear to have been separated by more than a century. Prof. Jacobi has shown that the Nyāyasūtras were composed between 200 and 150 A. C. and that the Nyāyabhāṣya was also written during the same period,¹ of course, towards the end of it. Mahamahopādhyāya Dr. Satis-chandra Vidyābhūṣhana has proved by a more detailed analysis that the author of the Nyāyabhāṣya "flourished at about A. D. 100, when Chandragupta II called Vikramāditya was King of Magadha."² By this time the author of the Kāmasūtra was, as we have already seen, an authority on erotics and, as we shall show more definitely below, at least a century had passed since he produced his work. Moreover, the styles of composition of the two authors are quite distinct. Then again, the author of the Kāmasūtra belongs most probably, as we shall show hereafter, to Western India while Dr. Vidyābhūṣhana assigns the writer of the Nyāyabhāṣya to the Dravida country.³ From all these considerations, we see that at present there is no valid reason for thinking that the two authors are one and the same.

Coming back to other works in Sanskrit literature referring to Vātsyāyana, we notice that in some editions of the Pañcatantra there are two passages in which Vātsyāyana is mentioned by name.⁴ However, in the Tantrākhyāyika which is considered to be the earliest recension of the Pañcatantra, the name of Vātsyāyana does not occur, but in enumerating the usual subjects of study it mentions first grammar and then the Dharma, Artha and Kāma Śāstras in general.¹ The Tantrākhyāyika has been supposed to have been written about 300 A.C.* The mention of the Kāmasūtra in it shows, at least, that the science of erotics had, in the third century A.C. obtained an equal footing with the sister sciences of Dharma and Artha as branches of learning that princes were required to acquire. This position it had not attained in 300 B.C. when, as we see from the Arthashastra of Kautilya, though kāma had been recognised as one of the subjects of human interest (trivarga), it had not as yet a locus standi as a science worth study, because it does not find a place in Kautilya's list where we find Dharma, Artha, Itihāsa, Purāṇa, and Akhyana (narratives) but not the Kāmaśāstra.³ In view of the fact, therefore, that it was Vātsyāyana who made popular the science which was almost extinct (utsanna-praya) in his time, the presumption is that the author of Tantrākhyāyika had his Kāmasūtra in mind when he wrote the passage above referred to. What we have said about the Tantrākhyāyika applies with equal force to the Parva-saṃgraha-parva which forms the introduction to the Mahābhārata and gives a summary of the whole story; it is certainly later than the main body of the work and may have been composed about the time we are speaking of. It describes the Mahābhārata as a veritable encyclopædia that embraced in its scope the Arthashastra, the Dharmaśāstra and the *Kāmasāstra*¹ shewing that the science was well-known at the time this chapter was added to the epic. It is significant in this connection that the Lalitavistara generally assigned to the second or third century A.C.,² in its enumeration of the subjects that the young Siddhārtha learnt, does not mention the Kāmasāstra in general but knows various sections of the science such as Strīlakṣhaṇa, Purāṣālakṣhaṇa, Vaiśika, etc., besides many of the Kalās.³ We know that these subjects had been dealt with by Vātsyāyana's predecessors and that there was a monograph on Vaiśika by Dattaka of Pāṭaliputra, and it is no wonder that the author of the Lalitavistara who here seeks to exhaust all the branches of learning known under the sun, should refer to these subjects though known in his time only to a very few, and on the other hand, it seems to indicate an earlier date for the Lalitavistara than that of the Kāmasūtra, though unquestionably both of them belong to the same period, and nothing can be asserted as certain from only a negative piece of evidence.

We thus see that from the literary data given above, the earlier limit to the composition of the Kāmasūtra may be assigned on the basis of Vātsyāyana's quotations from the Gṛhya and Dharma Sūtras, the Arthasastra of Kauṭilya and the Mahābhāṣya of Patañjali and that the lower limit may be fixed at circa 400 A.C. based on the dates of Kālidāsa and Subandhu and, further, that there are strong reasons to believe that it was known in the third century A.C. From the historical data that the Kāmasūtra affords we can come to a more definite determination of Vātsyāyana's date.

Historical Data about the Date of Vātsyāyana

The well-known passage¹ referring to the Andhra monarch Kuntala Śātakarṇi first pointed out by Sir R.G. Bhandarkar² furnishes important data. According to the Puranic list of the Andhra monarchs, Kuntala Svāti or Svātikarṇa is the thirteenth in descent from Simuka, the founder of the family. Sri Malla Śātakarṇi, the third monarch in this list, has been identified by Mr. K.P. Jayaswal with the Satakani mentioned in the Hāthigumpha inscription of Khāravela and it has been shown by him that an expedition was undertaken by Khāravela in 171 B.C. against this Śātakarṇi.³ Kuntala is separated from him by 168 years according to the Puranic enumeration⁴ which is held as substantially correct. Kuntala therefore reigned about the very beginning of the Christian era.⁵ Calculating again back from the great Andhra monarch Gautamīputra Śātakarṇi who according to professor D. R. Bhandarkar came to the throne in A.C. 133⁶ and who according to the Puranic list is separated from Kuntala Śātakarṇi by about 123 years, we find that the reigning period of Kuntala falls in the early years of the first century A. C.

2 Early History of the Deccan, p. 31. I beg leave to submit that Kartari here does not mean 'a pair of scissors' as translated by Sir R. G. Bhāndārkar, but it is a technical term to denote a kind of stroke dealt by a man with one or both of his hands at a woman's head at the parting of the hair (Simanta). Vātsyāyana says that these strokes are in vogue among the people of the south (Dākṣiṇātyānām) and he condemns them as they sometimes proved fatal. The case of Kuntala Śātakarṇi is an example in point. See Kāmasūtra, Ben. ed., pp. 147-9.

5 Mr. Ramaprasad Chandra would place Satakani of Khāravela about B.C. 75-20. Kuntala then would belong to the end of the first century A.C. (Memoirs of the Arch. Sur. of Ind. No. 1, p. 11, 1919).

6 Dekkan of the Śātavāhana Period, Ind. Ant. 1918 p. 78.

This is then the upper limit of the composition of the Kāmasūtra which was therefore written between the first and the fifth centuries after Christ. We may next attempt to come to a closer approximation.

Vātsyāyana mentions the Ābhīras and the Andhras as ruling side by side at the same time in the South-West of India. He speaks of an Abhīra Koṭṭarāja,¹ a king of Koṭṭa in Gujerat, who was killed by a washerman employed by his brother. Then, again, in his chapter on the conduct of women confined in harems, Vātsyāyana describes the sexual abuses practised in the seraglio of the Abhīra kings among others. Now, King Īsvarasena, son of the Ābhīra Śivadatta, is mentioned as a ruling sovereign in one of the Nasik inscriptions and is thought to have reigned in the third century A.C.² Besides, Mahākshatrapa Īsvaradatta is considered on very reasonable grounds to have been an Ābhīra, and his coins show that he reigned some time between circa 236 and 239 A.C.³ About a century later, in the early years of the fourth century A.C. (circa 336 A.C.), the Ābhīras were met by Samudragupta.⁴ The period when the Ābhīras most flourished, therefore, was the third century A.C. on epigraphic and numismatic grounds. The Andhra rulers are also referred to by Vātsyāyana but certainly as mere local kings. In his chapter on Īśvara-kāmita, or "The Lust of Rulers," Vātsyāyana describes when the Guptas of whom there is no mention in the Kāmasūtra, were again uniting northern India under a common sway. From this the conclusion is inevitable that the Kāmasutra was composed about the middle of the third century A.C. and this agrees with the conclusion arrived at from an examination of the literary data.

Since the above remarks about the date of the Kāmasūtra were placed before the public in the several scholars in India and Europe have expressed their opinion on the same subject. Of these, Prof. A. Banerji Sastri has examined the question in the *Journal of the Bihar and Orissa Research Society*¹ and has arrived at almost the same conclusion as myself on mostly the same arguments, the only difference being that Prof. Sastri would place Vātsyāyana to "approximately the end of the

him about the middle. Prof. Sastri, moreover, differs from me in thinking that Bhāsa's drama, Arimāraka, was known to Vātsyāyana,² while I have expressed my doubts about it.³

Prof. Jolly in the introduction to his edition of the Arthasāstra has sought to prove that the Arthasāstra was composed in the third century after

Christ and the Kāmasūtra which was modelled upon it, in the fourth century A.C. Every one of the arguments of Jolly with regard to the date of the Arthasāstra has been critically examined by Mr. K. P. Jayaswal in his recently published work on *Hindu Polity*⁴ and has been shown to be untenable, and the 4th century B.C. has been proved to be the only probable date for that work. His theory therefore with regard to the date of Vātsyāyana naturally falls to the ground.

Applying to this date Prof. Jolly's dictum that the Kāmasutra and the Arthasāstra could not have been separated by more than a century at most¹ we would arrive at a date which is absurd for the Kāmasūtra. Jolly does not consider the political evidence as very conclusive and holds that "it will be necessary to confine oneself to the literary data in fixing the age of the Kāmasūtra" (p. 29); and the evidence offered by the literary data is this according to him: "If both Kālidāsa and Subandhu are rightly referred to the fifth century A.D., the Kāmasūtra might be placed in the fourth century."² This theory twice applied here by Jolly that whenever there are two authors of whom one shows evidence of his debt to the other, they cannot be separated by more than a century, is one that will hardly hold good in the history of literature of any country in the world. There is no earthly reason why Kālidāsa and Vātsyāyana cannot be separated by two centuries and Kautilya and Vātsyāyana by six centuries. Kālidāsa, when he had occasion to refer to the Kāmasāstra, found Vātsyāyana's book to be the standard work on the subject and naturally borrowed from it, and Vātsyāyana too, when he set himself to write the Kāmasutra, a work on a secular subject in a country where most of the literature was religious, had naturally his eyes turned to this masterly work which like his was 'thoroughly realistic and worldly'³, and which manifested 'a rare unity of plan and structure', and which even now we have no hesitation in declaring 'the most precious work in the whole range of Sanskrit literature.'¹ During the many centuries that intervened between the two authors, Kauṭilya's work had not been superseded but still dominated the field as it continued to dominate for many centuries longer. Is it any wonder then that Vātsyāyana should take this work on an allied subject as his model and borrow its method and style ?

I, however, agree with Prof. Jolly (p. 26) in holding that the abstention from meat which Vātsyāyana refers to while defining 'Dharma'² is only a theory, or rather an ideal which, as Vātsyāyana says, people would learn from the Sāstra or the works on that subject and it did not represent the actual state of things in his time. A glimpse at real life which we have in his section on Samprayoga shows that meat diet was in vogue, and both amongst men and women. Vātsyāyana advises a lover to please his mistress when she feels rather tired or exhausted, with such relishes as roasted or dried meat as well as gruel and extracts of meat of various kinds. One of them is called by Vātsyāyana accha-rasaka-yūṣam and the commentary explains that it was a fresh extract of meat (māṃsa-niryūham), and another called amla-yavāgū is said to be prepared by boiling with meat (māṃsa-siddhā).³ The doctrine of ahimsā and the eating of meat have existed in India side by side since the earliest Vedic times and no conclusion can be arrived at with regard to the date of a work simply from the mention or non-mention of the doctrine of ahimsā in it. Even in the R̥gveda, the cow was recognised as aghnyā and the ox as aghnya (not to be slaughtered), while in the Vinaya Piṭaka itself we are told that oxen in plenty were slaughtered by Sīha, the Licchavi Commander-in-Chief to feed the Buddha and his attending bhikṣus.¹ A newly converted minister at Benares placed twelve hundred and fifty dishes of meat (māṃsa-pāṭi) before the bhikṣus including the Buddha himself.² The mere fact, therefore, that a work prohibits meat-eating is not sufficient reason to dub it as post-Buddhistic.

What has been said above with regard to Prof. Jolly's theory about the date of the Kāmasūtra applies with equal force to what Prof. M. Winternitz—
Fourth Century A.C. Winternitz has observed on the same subject in the third volume of his History of Indian Literature where he has arrived at the same conclusion as Dr. Jolly and on the very same grounds, though independently. Thus the Professor observes: "That it (the Kāmasūtra) is later than the Kauṭilya-Arthasāstra cannot be doubted. But it can hardly be much later; for the great similarity between the two books makes it clear that the Kāmasūtra is separated from Kauṭilya only by a short interval. If we place the latter, say, in the third century after Christ, then the Kāmasūtra of Vātsyāyana is to be placed somewhere in the fourth. But it is nothing more than a guess." Here it will be seen that Winternitz also has nothing more to fix the date than the mere guess that Kauṭilya and Vātsyāyana cannot be separated by more than a century. As in the case of Jolly, Winternitz's failure to establish the third century for Kauṭilya necessarily leads to the rejection of the fourth century for Vātsyāyana.

Magadhan Literature has, on the other hand, sought to push back the date of the Kāmasūtra to the first century A.C., his argument being that "Vātsyāyana flourished at a time when the memory of the scandal (of Kuntala Śātakarṇi) was fresh. So he may be placed in the first century A.D.; for, the public memory is far short and in one or two generations, people forget these scandals."¹ Here the Mahāmahopādhyāya, unlike Jolly, considers the political data as the deciding factor, but accepting his conclusion we are met by the difficulty that in the first century A.C., we have no evidence of Âbhīra monarchs ruling side by side with the Andhras. Both according to epigraphic as well as Pauranic evidence, the Âbhīras rose to power in the third century A.C., so that the date of Vātsyāyana who is no less acquainted with the scandals of the Âbhīra court than with those among the Andhras, cannot be placed in the first century A.C. Moreover, we have ample evidence to show that court scandals are referred to by Indian writers many centuries after they took place. Vātsyāyana himself refers to the scandal of Dāndakya, the Bhoja² who must have lived many centuries prior to the composition of the Kāmasūtra. Visākhadatta in his Mudrārāksasa refers to court intrigues and scandals many centuries older than his time. The Bṛhat Samhitā refers to scandals like that of king Vidūratha who was killed by his queen with a sharp instrument hid in her hair and to a Kāśīrāja who was similarly killed with a poisoned anklet³ and there is nothing to show that they lived about the same time as Varāha-mihira. Aśvaghoṣa in the fourth chapter of his Buddhacarita relates scandals most of which were far removed in date from his. We are therefore unable to see eye to eye with MM. Haraprasad Sastri with regard to the date fixed by him for the Kāmasūtra.

Some other points in MM. Sastri's work call for comment. He identifies Śvetaketu,¹ the mythical reformer of primitive society, who according to an account in the Mahābhārata set up the institution of marriage, with Svetaketu Āruṇeya, the highly cultured philosopher of the Upanishads. The Rgveda shows a well-organised family life with the institution of marriage fully developed amongst the Indo-Aryans, and therefore, the age when that institution grew and developed must have preceded the Rgvedic era by a very long period and the age of Śvetaketu Āruṇeya—an age of intense metaphysical speculation when the Upanishadic literature grew, could certainly not be identical with it. Then there is not the least justification for MM. Sastri's statement that "Auddālaki wrote more on union or Samprayoga than on other subjects. He divided that subject into ten major heads. So his work was called Daśatavī"² These are all statements unauthorised by Vātsyāyana who on the other hand asserts that Śvetaketu's huge work in five hundred chapters dealt with the whole of the Kāmasāstra and that it was Bābhravya who divided and arranged the contents of Śvetaketu's work into seven adhikaraṇas or sections; in fact, of the three passages in the Kāmasūtra where Vātsyāyana quotes Auddālaki, one belongs to the Samprayoga section, another to the Pāradārika, and the third to the Vaiśika section.³ The third of these is the longest quotation from Auddālaki where a whole group of sūtras is spoken of by Vātsyāyana as the opinion of Auddālaki as distinguished from the theory of Bābhravya, so that there is no justification for the conjecture that Audālakī's work dealt with the one topic of Samprayoga alone. It was rather Bābhavya, the Pāñcāla who specially shone in his delineation of the sixty-four Samprayoga-kalās. For the other statements that Audālakī's work was called Daśatayī or that he divided Samprayoga into ten sections, there is absolutely no foundation. Vātsyāyana says that the Ṛgveda was called Dasatayī and not Audālakī's work and in the whole chapter where this topic is dealt with there is no reference to Audālakī at all.

1 Magadhan Literature, p. 78

Prof. Batuknath Bhattacharya in his paper headed "A Brief Survey of the Sāhityaśāstra" in the Journal of the Department of Letters of the University of Calcutta, has incidentally discussed the date of the Kāmasūtra.¹ He has not hazarded any definite opinion on the date but has expressed his difference with the conclusion arrived at by me, mainly on two grounds. In the first place, he observes, "It is hard to believe that it (the Kāmasūtra) could have been composed later than the Nāṭya-Sāstra, considering the style in which it is written—a style distinctly aphoristic in nature and reminiscent of the sūtra period (600-200 B.C.)." Vātsyāyana's mention of Kuntala Sātakarni precludes any possibility of his composing the sūtras on erotics in the so-called sūtra period of Max Müller, and while comparing the Kāmasūtra with the Nāṭyasastra it should be borne in mind that the latter, though passing as the product of one author who is more or less mythical, bears on its face the evidence of the handiwork of different ages, that, in fact, we have before us, as Prof. Winternitz observes, "a compilation of various older and later texts." The same scholar also remarks that "the original work was probably a Sūtra-text, as indeed the oldest scientific works as a rule were composed in the Sūtra style."² The Nāṭyaśāstra has been variously assigned by scholars from the first to the sixth or seventh century A.C.,³ so that it is not unlikely that some portions of the Nāṭyaśāstra were older than the Kāmasūtra while others were much younger.

The particular point on which, however, Prof. Bhattacharya sets up a comparison between the two works viz., the classification of men and women into different categories, proves nothing, as the different authors have proceeded to classify them from different points of view. Vātsyāyana divides men into Śesa, Vṛsa and Aśva and women into Mṛgī, Baḍavā and Hastinī from their different capacities for samprayoga, while Bharata's classification of women into 24 varieties⁴ is based on æsthetic, intellectual and moral standards. No comparison lies between the two authors in this respect and the more elaborate classification of Bharata does not necessarily imply a later date. We find the same three-fold classification of males and females in the Anangaranga, a work on erotics composed in the late 15th or early 16th century A.C. when the Lodi Emperors were ruling at Delhi.

Next, Prof. Bhattacharya remarks, "It seems a little remarkable that Vātsyāyana should not have mentioned any of his predecessors more contiguous to his own date but should have looked so far back as to the 4th century B.C. This would argue a certain break in the continuity of the study." There was indeed such a break in the continuity of the study of the science of Erotics, as Vātsyāyana himself asserts that the Kāmasāstra was very near extinction (utsannakalpam-abhūt) before he took it up, so much so, that he had to fall back upon the ancient and little-read text of Bābhravya to compile his work; he does not think much of the monographs of Dattaka and others which he holds were rather fragmentary and scrappy (khaṇḍaśaḥ praṇītam).⁵

CHAPTER II

THE GEOGRAPHY OF VÂTSYÂYANA

Vâtsyayana in enumerating the special customs and practices in different parts of India mentions many of its countries and peoples. He appears to have been familiar with all parts of the Indian continent. Of the five great divisions of India since the Vedic times he mentions three, viz the Prācya country, the Madhyadesa and the Dāksinātya or the Dakṣināpatha. In the Vedic age, as we know from a well known passage in the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa (viii. 14), the whole of India is shown to consist of five great Diks or divisions, the Prācī Dik with its Samrāt rulers, the Dakṣinā Dik with its Bhoja sovereigns, the Pratīcī and Udīcī Diks with their Svarāt and Vīrāt rulers, and the Dhruvā Madhyamā Dik with its kings called Rājās. This partition of India into five Diks, that is quarters or divisions, is found to be a familiar practice in the Atharva-Veda and both the Kṛṣṇa and Sukla recensions of the Yajurveda Samhitā.¹ In later times we find the Dik often changed into Desa, as for example, the Prācī Dik and the Madhyamā-Dik are called the Prācya-Deśa and the Madhya-Deśa respectively. This traditional division of India into Diks or Desas is found throughout in Indian literature : it is found in the Vedic works, the Epics and the Purāṇas, the astronomical works like those of Parāśara and Varāhamihira, and in the Kāryamīmāṃsā of Rājasekhara written about the beginning of the tenth century we find the same five-fold division of the Indian continent. This system of general division of India was also adopted by some of the Chinese travellers.

A few places in the Central Division of India are referred to by Vatsyayana in his work and the general name Madhyadeśa also has been employed by him in one passage where he says that in the Madhyadeśa, there being a preponderance of Āryas, that is, of persons of decent character who were pure in their habits, the ladies in that region disliked unclean practices like kissing, pressing the nails and biting by the other sex.¹ This Madhyadesa is no doubt the same as the Madhyamā Dik of Vedic literature; and may be considered to have the same limits as the Madhyadesa of Manu who defines it as the country between the Himavat and the Vindhya mountains, to the west of Prayaga and to the east of Vinasna, that is, of the spot where the river Sarasvatī disappears; but more probably, it is the region between the Ganges and the Jumna, that is, the land of the Āryas according to one of the views pointed out by Vasiṣṭha and Baudhāyana in their Dharmasūtras.³ The commentary, Jayamangalā is inclined to adopt this definition of the boundaries of the Madhyadeśa, because, as it says, this is mainly intended by the author of the Kāma-Śāstra.⁴

The word Ārya used here by Vātsyāyana is not an ethnical designation but it is applied to a person who, as Vātsyāyana says, is pure in habits (śucyupacāra) ; in the example given by him the Arya ladies of the Madhyadesa did not like such practices as kissing or biting, apparently because of their aversion to contamination by spittle from another's mouth, that is, to what is known as vechista. It is evident, therefore, that Ārya in Vātsyāyana means the same thing as in Vasistha and Baudhāyana, that is, a Śista or a person of decent habits and character, as will be seen from a reference to their respective Dharmasūtras.¹ There can, therefore, be no doubt that the Āryāvarta of these latter authors was not the land of the Aryans, but the land of the Śistas whose manners and customs, habits and practices were decent and pure according to the Dharma literature. In the Mahābhāṣya Patañjali also explains Āryāvarta as the land of the Śistas.²

It is worthy of remark, however, that in Vātsyāyana's time decent conduct was more in evidence in Eastern India, among people whom he calls Prācyas than among some of the peoples of the Madhyadesa, and these Prācyas he places among the Śistas. Thus in his chapter on Auparistaka, a very filthy practice, Vātsyāyana observes, "The people of Eastern India do not resort to women who practise the Auparistaka. The people of Ahicchatra resort to such women but do nothing with them, so far as the mouth is concerned. The people of Sāketa do with them every kind of mouth (abuses), while the people of Nagara do not practise this, but do every other thing. The people of the Surasena country, on the southern bank of the Jumna, do everything without any hesitation, for they say that women being naturally unclean, no one can be certain about their character, their purity, their conduct, their practices, their confidences, or their speech. They are not, however, on this account to be abandoned, because religious law, on the authority of which they are reckoned pure, lays down that the udder of a cow is clean at the time of milking. Again a dog is clean when he seizes a deer in hunting. A bird is clean when it causes a fruit to fall from a tree by pecking at it. And the mouth of a woman is clean for kissing and such like things."¹ Vātsyāyana finally sums up by saying that in all these matters connected with love, one should be guided by the custom of one's own country and one's own personal inclination in as much as while on the one hand, the holy texts (Smṛiti) allowed some latitude in such things, on the other hand, however, they were against the practice of the śiṣṭas (śiṣṭa-vipratipateḥ)² Here the commentary explains that the śiṣṭas spoken of in this passage are the Prācyas, the Ahicchatrikas and the Nāgarakas,³ and the context shows that he is right.

Of the various peoples mentioned in the above passage from the Kāmasūtra, the Ahicchatrikas and the Saurasenans were natives of the Madhyadeśa and the Nāgarakas also belonged probably to that region for reasons that will be shown below. Of these, Ahicchatra, identified with modern Ramnagar in the Bareilly district,⁴ was the capital of the northern division of the Pañcāla country according to the Mahābhārata which states that as the result of the defeat which Dronācārya inflicted on Drupada, the Pañcāla king, the country was partitioned into two, and that the Brahmin teacher of the Kurus established his capital at Ahicchatra to the north of the Ganges,¹ and that up to this place the Kaurava battalions reached when the forces of the opposing armies assembled for the Great War.² It is a significant fact that we find a Brahmin family ruling at Ahicchatra in the second century B.C. and that it had marital relations with the great Brahmin imperial family of the Sungas. The names of this family of Kings of Adhichatra which is apparently the same as Ahicchatra are given in two inscriptions in a cave at Pabhosā (the classical hill of Prabhāsa) 3 miles to the north-west of Kosam, the ancient Kauśāmbī. The inscription inside the cave records that it was "caused to be made by Āṣāḍhāsena, son of the Vaihidarī (i.e., Vaihidara-princess, and) son of King Bhāgavata, son of the Tevanī (i.e., Traivarna-princess), and son of King Vamgapāla, son of Sonakāyana (Śaunakāyana) of Adhichatra."³ Another inscription on the rock outside the cave records the further fact that this Aśādhasena was the maternal uncle of King Bahasatimitra, the son of Gopālī.¹ This King Bahasatimitra has been identified with the Śunga Emperor, Puṣyamitra by Mr. K. P. Jayaswal² who holds that "the Ahichatra family of Aśādhasena was either gubernatorial or feudatory to the Magadha throne." He further points out that the "Ahichatra family were Brahmans like the Śungas, an ancestor of Aśādhasena being called Śaunakāyana." In the neighbourhood of Ahicchatra have been picked up the so-called Mitra coins and among them those of a King Agnimitra who is considered to be the same as the second emperor of the Śunga dynasty,³ and a dedicatory inscription at Budh Gayā assigned to the earlier part of the first century B.C., records the gift of a queen of King Indramitra of Ahicchatra.⁴ We know very little of the subsequent history of Ahicchatra but by the time that Vātsyāyana wrote his book, in the third century B.C., this city must have passed like the whole of the province to which it belongs through the hands of the Kushan monarchs. It is significant that while Vātsyāyana speaks of the people of Ahicchatra, he has nothing to record of the king or the king's harem as he does in other cases.

The Saurasenas occupied the country about the city of Mathurā, their capital. They are located by the commentary to the south of the river Kauśāmbī⁵ which is apparently the stream flowing by the celebrated city of the same name. From the character that Vātsyāyana gives them they appear to have fallen off from the pure nd ideal conduct that characterised them in ancient times according to Manu who says, "The plain of the Xurus, the (country of the) Matsyas, Pāñcālas, and Śūrasenakas, these (form) indeed, the country of the Brahmanas (Brahmanical sages, which ranks) immediately after Brāhmāvarta. From a Brāhmaṇa born in that country let all men on earth learn their several usages".¹ Evidently the Śaurasenas had fallen off from this high standard of purity under foreign domination. Mathurā had been occupied by the Greeks in the early years of the second century B.C. as pointed out by Kern on the authority of the Gārgī-Samhitā which says, "Then the viciously valiant Greeks, after reducing Sāketa, Pāñcāla country and Mathurā will reach or take Kusumadhvaja (Palibothra)."² The Gārgī-Samhitā further adds that sometime after the Greeks, the country was occupied by the Śakas or Scythians.³ This is fully corroborated by coins and inscriptions unearthed in Mathurā itself and the country in its neighbourhood showing that about the first century before Christ the Śaka satraps Hagāna, Hagamasha, Rañjubula, Sodāsa etc. were ruling at Mathurā. Henceforth this city was under the domination of the Kushan monarchs for several centuries, so that in the third century after Christ when, according to our determination, Vātsyāyana wrote his work, the Śaurasenas had got much degraded by intercourse with foreigners of immensely inferior culture and had lost the ancient purity in their manners and customs that made Manu characterise them as an ideal people from whom all other peoples on earth were to imbibe good and decent behaviour.

The people of Sāketa who also passed through the same vicissitudes were almost as bad as those of Sūrasena, but the latter were worse in as much as they quoted scripture to support their vile a' uses. Sāketa (otherwise known as Ayodhyā) was the capital of the Kosala country, and this name which had been coming into prominence since the Buddhist times was in use in the second century

B.C. as we see from its mention in the *Mahābhāṣya*¹ and later also we find it in the passage quoted above from the Gārgi Samhitā; we find, therefore, in the Kāmasūtra this name in use in preference to Ayodhyā. I have shown elsewhere that Sāketa was on the boundary in between the Madhyadeśa and the Prācyā division of India.²

It is noteworthy that though Vātsyāyana refers to some of the practices of the Āhicchatrikas or the people of Ahicchatra, the ancient capital of northern Pañcāla, of the Pañcāla people as such he has got nothing to say. He speaks of the Pañcāla country no doubt but it will times ;¹ he further points out the connection of the Pancala country with the division of the R̥gveda into sixty-four chapters and draws an analogy between this fact and the invention of the sixty-four Pāñcāla kalās or arts² described by Bābhravya. But he notes no peculiarity in the conduct of the Pāñcālas of his day nor does he mention any contemporary practices in the relations between the sexes as he does of the other peoples of India. Evidently the Pāñcāla people who occupied a prominent position among the Vedic Aryans in the period of the Brāhmanas and whose country made up one of the sixteen Mahājanapadas when the early works of the Theravāda school of the Buddhists were written, had lost their individuality as a separate people ; at Abicchatra, their ancient capital, the people must have been strongly influenced by foreign occupation—as at Mathurā.

Of the countries of the Udīcya or northern division, Vātsyāyana speaks still less than of the Madhyadesa or the Midland proper. He nowhere mentions the Udīcya division by name but he refers to the customs and practices of some of the countries in the Udīcya division and even beyond the northern hills. Of the people on the Himalayas he speaks in general (Haimaratānām) without mentioning any particular country or state, saying that among the Haimavatas or people of the Himalayas, “adventurous citizens combining together bribe the sentinels and enter the harem.”³ country (Bāhlīkadeśyāḥ), the Kāmasūtra informs us that they, like the women of the Madhydeśa, were of decent habits and averse to kissing and similar unclean practices.²

Vātsyāyana also speaks of a very peculiar custom which the Bāhlīka country had in common with Strīrājya and the province of Grāmanārī he avers that in these countries several young men were married to a single woman (ekaikasyāḥ parigrahabhūtāḥ) and they were in the same position there as ladies in the harem in other countries.³ Vātsyāyana does not say exactly that these male spouses were confined in a harem by their lordly wives but that they had the same character as harem-ladies (antahpurasadharmāṇaḥ) that is, as the commentary explains, they had all to confine their services to the single lady who was their mistress and had to attend upon her either singly or in batches.⁴ This rather unusual custom, no doubt refers to a system of polyandry carried to a refined excess. It was perhaps

It is important to determine the geographical position of the country of Bāhlīka. The city of Balkh

Bāhlīka is the country about Balkh i.e., Bactria in Bactria which makes the closest approach to its name seems to indicate its ancient location though some scholars are inclined to doubt it and to suggest that it was somewhere near the Kuru land.² But that ancient India extended beyond the present north-western frontier seems indisputable from many considerations. The Chinese travellers, for example, found Balkh Indian to all intents and purposes. Yuan Chwang to reach the country which

Yuan Chwang found Indian culture in Bactria he calls Fo-ho-lo (I-ting names it Fo-ko-lo),³ travelled some hundreds of li from Tokhāra, crossed the Oxus and passed through some territories of small extent. He found Indian culture and civilisation predominating here, there being above hundred Buddhist monasteries with more than three thousand⁴ brethren, all adherents of the "Small Vehicle" or the Hīnayāna system. He says that it reached on the north to the Oxus, the Wakhsh of Arab geographers and the Vaksu or Vanksu of Kālidāsa. As we have shown before, Kālidāsa makes

Kālidāsa's Vāṅksu is the Oxus in Bactria Raghu meet the Hūnas on the banks of the Oxus.⁵ Kālidāsa says that Raghu's

horses relieved the fatigue of their long journey by rolling about on the banks of the Vanksu and shook their shoulders to which were attached filaments of saffron¹. Amara in his lexicon speaks of the yellow variety of the saffron grown in the Bāhlīka country,² and Kṣīrasvāmin, the earliest commentator of Amara, assures us that this Bāhlīka saffron was referred to by Kālidāsa.³ Yuan Chwang also speaks of saffron (Curcuma = kuṅkuma, saffron) grown in the country about this region. There can, therefore, be no doubt that the country about Balkh and reaching up to the Oxus was known as the Bāhlīka country at the time of Kālidāsa, that is, according to our calculations, about two centuries later than Vātsyāyana⁴.

The Atharva-Veda Parisiṣṭa leaves no doubt that the Vedic Bāhlīka was Bactria in as much as it speaks of the Bāhlīkas in a group Śaka-yavana-Tukhāra-Bāhlīkāśca.⁵ These Tukhāras are no doubt the Tokharas (Tu-huo-lo) through whose country Yuan Chwang passed to the country of Balkh.

That Bāhlīka was regarded by Indians as belonging to the Udīcya division of the country is seen from Kālidāsa's verse immediately preceding the one we have referred to above where we are told that Raghu on his way to the Vaṅkṣu or the Oxus met the Udīcyaś and inflicted a defeat upon them. This is also clear from a passage in the Nāṭyaśāstra where Bharata tells us that of the seven local dialects (Sapta bhāṣāḥ) of India, the Bāhlīka-bhāṣā was spoken by the Udicyas and the Khasas and was the language of their own country¹ (svadeśajā)

The ear liest mention of Bāhlīka in Indian literature viz., in the Atharva-Veda shows that it was far away in the north even beyond the Mūjavants.

Bāhlīka in Atharva-Veda is far away in the North O fever," says a hymn of this Veda, "Go to the Mūjavants or to the Bāhlīkas, further off."² If Mūjavant is the name of a hill in or about Kāsmīr, the Bāhlīka country must have been farther in the north and evidently the same region where we find it in later Indian literature, though Zimmer³ and the authors of the *Vedic Index*⁴ are inclined to doubt it. The points raised by Zimmer have been answered by Weber⁵ and we think, satisfactorily. We however, differ from Roth and Weber who thought that an Iranian tribe was here referred to. The Bāhlīkas are apparently an Indian tribe, or at least an Indo-Iranian tribe that had been under the Indian influence from very early times.

Kautilya in his Arthaśāstra mentions three kinds of leather produced in the Bāhlī country⁶ and in this formed by Pāṇini from Kāpiśī, Bālhāyana is formed from the word Bālhī.¹

In this connection it may be noted that the word Kāpiśī in the main sūtra of Pāṇini which Kātyāyana supplements, refers no doubt to the country of Kapi-shih of Yuan chwang² in the neighbourhood of Bāhlīka; it was famous for its vine-yards now as in ancient times as is shown by the example by which the Kāśikā-Vṛtti explains the rule³ and we observe that the soldiers of Raghu also relieved themselves from their fatigue with the liquor of that country in the rich vine-yards. The Kāśikā-Vṛtti further compares the favourite drink of the Bāhlīkas with those of other well-known Indian tribes and peoples: "The Usīnaras drink milk (Kṣīra), while the favourite beverage of the Prācyas is Surā, that of the Bāhlīkas is Sauvīra and that of the Gandhāras Kaṣāya"⁴. In the *Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa*⁵ we find mention of Bahlika-Prātipīya who is called a Kauravya King (Kauravyo rājā), and the same king apparently is the Mahārājā Bāhlīka Prātipīya⁷ of the Great Epic. Devāpi being rejected by the representatives of the people—the Paurajānapada—went to the forest and became an ascetic and the second Bāhika, obtained the very rich kingdom of his maternal uncle and abdicated the paternal throne in favour of the youngest Śāntanu.¹ He fought with his Bāhikas on the side of Duryodhana. This explains how a Kaurava prince came to rule over the Bāhika people in the distant north and shows that in ancient times the Kurus were connected by matrimonial bonds with ruling families in the North-west, even beyond the mountain-barriers; Pāndu's marriage with Mādrī and that of Dhṛtarāṣṭra with Gāndhārī shows the intimacy of the relations between the Kurus and the Kṣatriya tribes in the North-west. In fact the Great Epic shows that the kingdoms on the North-west frontier and beyond—Madra, Gāndhāra, Kāmboja, Bāhika—were looked upon as Indian provinces and Vātsyāyana shows that this feeling continued so late as the third century A.C when the Kāmasūtra was written.

Greek occupation of the country as well as intermixture with other foreign peoples had considerably modified the customs and practices of the Bāhikas from the moral standard of the Indians thus making them hateful to the latter, so that their rulers are placed among the barbarous and sinful kings who will rule on earth on the advent of the Kaliyuga,² and the people are considered, as we have seen before, as the very dregs of the earth.

In the Great Epic itself there is evidence that some of the Bāhlikas at least were Asuras, that is, Iranians in Bāhlika Asura-worshippers or Iranians : we are told of a very powerful king of the Bāhlikas Darada by name who was a Mahāsura or a great Asura and this Darada, the Bāhlika, is praised highly by Śisupāla, an Indian sovereign with Asura tendencies.¹

The Uttarakāṇḍa of the Rāmāyaṇa records a very interesting and important tradition which goes to show that one of the most powerful ruling families of India was originally derived from the Bāhlika country.² It is a variant of the well-known myth of Ila which is found in all the Purāṇas and both the Epics. We are told here that Ila, a son of the Prajāpati Kardama, was the king of the Bāhlika country. Then the story goes on to relate how he was turned into a woman and passed by the name of Ilā, and when in this condition, had a son Purūravas Aila, by Budha, the son

In the Great Epic Bāhlika is sometimes confounded with Bālika or the region where the Sindhu flows with its five branches, including the Madra country over which Salva ruled, and Mādrī is once called Bāhlika (I. 125-21) and Nilakaṇṭha in his gloss on Mbt. V. 39, 80, makes the same mistake of Soma, the moon-god. He ultimately recovered his male form by virtue of an Asvamedha sacrifice performed under the auspices of his father, Kardama. Then the story tells us that Ila gave up Bāhlika, placing his first son, Śasavindu on the throne of that country and himself founded a new city, Pratiṣṭhāna-pura by name in the Madhyadeśa and set up a kingdom there. After his death Purūṇvas Aila ascended the throne left vacant by Ila.¹ This Pratiṣṭhānapura was, as we know from the Purāṇas and Kālidāsa's Vikramorvaśīyam,² situated at the junction of the Ganges with the Yamunā, that is, was identical with Prayāga or Allahabad. The story as related here is virtually the same as in the other Purāṇas, but the importance of this version lies in its statement that Ila was originally a ruler of the Bāhlika country and at last set up a kingdom in the Midland which was the centre of Vedic Aryan culture. The mythical character of the tradition tracing back the descent of some of the most important ruling families of India up to Soma, shows that it relates to the very earliest times

A Reminiscence of the Aryan Cradle in Central Asia of the Aryan settlement in India and its connection with Bāhlika or Bactria may suggest that it is a reminiscence of the times when the Aryan race was dwelling in its cradle-land in Central Asia.

Another country where, as we have seen above, men were kept in the same position as ladies in the harem, was Strirājya. As its name indicates, here the women perhaps exercised power in state affairs and apparently polyandry was the rule here giving the women a greater preponderance than in Bāhlika or any other country; that it was not entirely mythical is proved by the details about the character of the ladies that Vātsyāyana gives in two passages besides the one quoted above. One of them states that in Strirājya artificial means of sexual enjoyment were resorted to by the women, and the other tells us of the character of women in the king's harem.¹ Vātsyāyana's mention of the Strirājya along with Bāhlika and the existence of the same sort of relations between the sexes in the two countries would seem to indicate that they were situated in the same region. The other two passages where Vātsyāyana mentions Strirājya in his work² do not offer any clear indication of its geographical position. Nor does the Commentary help us here. The comment on one of the passages only gives a synonym for Strirājya viz., Strīpurī, and the other tells us that the Strirājya was to the West of the Vajravantadesa or Vaṅgarakta³ about whose position we know nothing. The Brhat Samhitā of Varāhamihira, however, supports us in the conjecture that it is about the north-western frontier of India that we have to look for this country of women, in as much as he definitely asserts that the Strīrājya belonged to the north-western quarter of India along with the Tuṣāras (Tokhāra of Yuan Chwang), the Aśmakas, the Madras and similar other tribes in that region.¹ Parāśara who belonged to a much earlier period and from whose Siddhānta Varāhamihira borrowed his statements, says expressly that in the north-west lived the Tuṣāras and other tribes, and beyond them was the Strīrājya² leaving no doubt that the Strīrājya was situated in the farthest quarter of the northwestern district. In the corresponding passage in the Mārkaṇḍeya-Purāṇa we have a mention, in the north-western quarter, of the country of Strīvāhya which is evidently a misreading of the name Strīrājya. In the Mahābhārata we are told that at the svayamvara of a daughter of Citrāṅgada, the King of Kalinga, came Mahārāja Sugāla, the ruler of the Strīrājya,³ but nothing can be ascertained about the position of the country from this mention, we can only be so far certain that the Strīrājya was looked upon as an integral part of India.

Yuan Chwang describes a country in the Himalayas far away to the north of the region about Gangādvāra or Hardwar. Thus he goes on, "To the north of this country (Brahmapura), and in the Great Snow Mountains, was the Suvarṇa-gotra country. The superior gold which it produced gave the country its name. This was called the 'Eastern woman's country' (that is, of the Chinese) so called because it was ruled by a succession of women. The husband of the queen was king, but he did not administer the government. The men attended only to the suppression of revolts and the cultivation of the fields. This country reached on the east to T'u-fan (Tibet), on the north to Khoten, and on the west to San-p'o-ha (Malasa)."¹

The boundaries of this country as given by the Chinese pilgrim show that it lay near to the Tibetan frontier and it is seen from his account that there was a Polyandry—

 a living custom in the Himalayas at present so called king of the country who was rather the Prince consort, and probably Mahārāja Sugāla, the Strīrājyādhipati of the Mahābhārata was one such king by courtesy. We have no reason to think that this Strīrājya was entirely mythical because we find that Strīrāj or polyandry is still prevalent about these regions, specially in the higher Himalayas. Thus we read in the Census Report,² "Polyandry or the custom of a woman having more husbands than one at one time, is peculiar to the Himalayas. It exists in the Kulu sub-division, the Bashahr state (Simla Hill States) and to a smaller extent in the Nahan, Mandi and Suket states." Again we have here, "Polyandry is confined to the upper Himalayas—i.e. Spiti, Lahul and Siraj in Kulu; Chamba Lahul in Chamba, Siraj in Mandi, Rampur, Chini (including Kava-war) and the upper minor states in Bashahar (State) and the Transgiri part of the Nahan State."³ Similar customs are also prevalent among the Brahmans and Rajputs in Kumaon.¹

The Rājatarāṅgiṇī mentions Strîrājya as one of the countries conquered by King Lalitāditya (first half of the 8th century A.C.) who we are told after vanquishing the Tukhāras who lived, as we have seen from Yuan-Chwang's account, in the immediate vicinity of Balkh or the Bāhlika country, conquered the country of the Amazons and proceeded to the land of the Uttarakurus² which according to the *Aitareya Brāhmaṇa*³ and the usual tradition was on the other side of the Himalayas, so that here it is seen that Strîrājya is considered to have been in the extreme north-west so as to agree with the location assigned to it by the Brhat Samhitā. If Strîrājya here is purely mythical like the Uttarakurus,⁴ yet it is significant as a record of the tradition that the country is considered to have been in the far north. But the Rājatarāṅgiṇī furnishes further details which would lead one to suppose that this Strîrājya of the Rājatarāṅgiṇī might not have been entirely a mythical land, a product of the poet's imagination merely. Lalitāditya is said to have placed an image of Nṛhari (Viṣṇu) in the Strîrājya.⁵ Again Lalitāditya's grandson, Jayāpīḍa, who reigned towards the end of the eighth century, is also credited with the conquest of Strîrājya by Kallhana who says "wonderful it is that after he had conquered a territory in the 'land of the Amazons' (Strîrājya) the [other] kings esteemed [still more] highly his victory over the group of his senses (indriyagrāma)."¹ Again he tells us of Jayāpīda's son, the debauchee Lalitāpīda, that "this king who was not satisfied with a few women, and who was full of violent desires, thought Jayāpīda an imbecile for having left the 'land of the Amazons' (Strîrājya) after he had conquered it."²

Bhaṭṭasvāmin, the celebrated commentator of the Arthasāstra, quotes a verse in which Strîrājya forms one of the countries which contained mines of precious stones.³ This verse has not been located as yet but it shows at least that in India Strîrājya was looked upon as an actual country and not as a mere mythical land.

The Strîrājya of Vātsyāyana, therefore, does not appear to have been a mythical land, but it must have been a state where polyandry was prevalent and where there was a king, apparently of the type described by Yuan-Chwang and it might have been located in the Himalayas to the north of the Panjab, but more probably in the region of the north-west beyond the Himalayas where the Brhat Samhitā and the Rājataranginī place it.

Vātsyāyana himself speaks of another country where also similar customs prevailed ; He calls it the Grāma-nārî-riṣaya, the 'District of village women' which appears rather to be a descriptive epithet than a proper name. The Commentary explains that this district was situated near the Strî-rājya farther away.⁴ It is nowhere else mentioned by Vātsyāyana. Most probably it formed a group of villages where polyandrous people lived and apparently they did not form an independent state like the Strîrājya.

Another country in the north-west of India which Vātsyāyana refers to, is that through which flow the six rivers including the Sindhu or the Indus.¹

The Land of the Six Rivers

The people living in this region, says Vātsyāyana, were fond of the filthy practice of Auparislaka ; that they were sexually very corrupt is borne out by the character given them by Karna in the *Mahābhārata*² which also describes the country almost in the very same words as Vātsyāyana³ and designates the people as Bāhikas. This Bāhika country is condemned in the strongest terms in the Mahābhārata and is declared as unfit for habitation by Āryas⁴ showing apparently that at the time of the Great Epic itself, the people of the Punjab were at a far lower stage of culture than that of the Vedic Indo-Aryans.

This land of the five rivers with the Indus as the sixth does not exactly belong to the Udīcya division, but to the Praticya or Western Division ; yet we mention it here on account of its affinity with the Udīcya countries and in fact, in the Mahābhārata, its ancient name Bāhika is sometimes confused with Bāhlīka, but that they were not the same country is quite apparent both from the descriptions of the two countries in the Epic itself, as well as the separate mention by Vātsyāyana of the two countries in sūtras¹ closely following each other in the same connection.

Of the Eastern or the Prācyā division of India Vātsyāyana mentions several countries and usages as well the general name Prācyā itself as a designation for the whole of the district. We have already referred to his eulogium of the Prācyā people who, as we have seen, unlike the Śaurasenās and the Sāketas were free from some of the grossest forms of sexual abuse.² The Commentary here explains that the Prācyas are people to the east of the Aṅga country, but here it is inconsistent with its own statement elsewhere; we have seen that according to the Commentary the limits of Vātsyāyana's Madhyadeśa are the same as those of Vasīṣṭha in his Dharmasūtra and hence the Prācyā district must lie to the east of Prayāga, or Allahabad, where that Madhyadeśa ends. As we shall show below, the Commentator's knowledge of Eastern India was far from satisfactory or reliable, and there is no reason to question that Vātsyāyana has used the word Prācyā in its usual sense since the Vedic times, viz., the region from Allahabad to the farthest eastern limits of India.

In describing the abuses in the king's harem Vātsyāyana says that among the Prācyas, a number of ladies—nine or ten in number—would combine and hide a common lover against discovery;³ besides he refers to some general customs prevalent in Prācyā countries

(Prācyopcūrāḥ) with respect to the conduct of the king towards his many wives¹, and also to the temporary so-called marriage of the daughter of a courtesan by a Nāgaraka.²

Of the countries included in the Prācyā division, Vātsyāyana mentions Kośalā, but as he speaks of it only once, in describing a practice which it had in common with the Strirājya,³ we cannot be sure whether it is the northern Kośala which was a part of the Prācyā region, or the Kośala in the south. But Vātsyāyana mentions, as we have already seen, Sāketa, the capital of the northern Kośala country in his time.

The country of Kāśī is also referred to by Vātsyāyana when speaking of the Kāśī-rāja Jayatsena who was murdered by his master of the horse when out on an affair of love.⁴

Vātsyāyana mentions three countries of the Prācyā Division, Vaṅga, Aṅga and Kalīṅga in one passage where he refers to the love-episodes of the royal harem. He says that Brahmins of the city under the pretext of giving flowers to the ladies enter the harem with the knowledge of the king, and speak with them from behind a curtain, and from such conversations union afterwards takes place.⁵ It is in his notes on this passage that the commentator, Yaśodhara, manifests his absolute ignorance of the geography of eastern India to which we have already referred. Thus he says that the Vaṅgas lived to the east of the Lauhitya or the Brahmaputra, the Aṅgas to the east of the Mahānadī and the Kalingas to the south of the Gauda-viṣaya, and that the Gaudas themselves were a Prācyā people living in Kāmarūpa.¹ Except with regard to the situation of Kalinga which may be said to be practically correct, all his other locations are absurd showing that he had no personal acquaintance with this part of India.

Gauda is mentioned several times by Vātsyāyana and appears to have been a separate kingdom from

Gauda of V

Modern Bengal Vaṅga at the time that he wrote; thus he makes a separate mention of the love-intrigues in the king's harem in the two countries, though they are virtually of the same character, in as much as he says that among the Gaudas these intrigues were carried on with Brahmins, relatives and servants etc.,² that is with men who had ordinarily access to the harem as in Vaṅga. In two other passages Vātsyāyana refers to the sense of beauty of the men and the softness and delicacy of the women of Gauda : thus while comparing the various fashions of dressing the nails by men in different parts of India, he says, "Large nails, which give grace to the hands, and attract the heart of women from their appearance, are possessed by the Bengalees."³ Burton here translates 'Gaudānā' by Bengalees. In another passage where Vātsyāyana compares the characteristics of the women of various parts of India, he speaks of the ladies of Gauda as soft and sweet in their speech, full of love and tender in their bodies.¹ Here the Commentary explains Gandya as Pūrvadeśabhavāḥ, and evidently Gauda of Vātsyāyana is northern Bengal. Vātsyāyana has separately mentioned Vaṅga showing that it formed a separate kingdom comprising the eastern districts of modern Bengal.

Gauda as the name of a city, a country, or a people, is found from very early times in Indian literature including the works of Pāṇini and Kauṭilya, and almost everywhere it appears to refer to Bengal. But as some scholars have expressed a doubt about it, the question deserves to be very carefully examined. Cunningham expressed the opinion that the ancient Gauda was "only a sub-division of Uttara-Kośala"² as against the mediæval city of Gauda in Bengal.³ Again, the late Mr. A. M. T. Jackson also, in connection with an inscription wherein the Rāṣṭrakūṭa king, Kṛṣṇa II, is declared to have been Gaudānām vinaya-vratārppana-gurūḥ,⁴ observes "It is too often assumed that in the tenth century and earlier the name Gauda means Bengal. I think, however, that this is a mistake which is responsible for much misreading of Indian History. It was, I think, Professor R. G. Bhandarkar who first expressed doubts on the point, and suggested that Gauda meant Gonda in Oudh. The key to the riddle is to be found in Alberuni's notes on the 'Voelkertafel' of Varāhamihira (Sachau's Alberuni's India, I, 300) which informs us that Guḍa = Tāneshar. This explains why the Sārasvat Brahmins of the holy Sarasvatī are the Gaudas par excellence, and why Gauda and Vaṅga are mentioned separately in the Baroda Grant of 812 A.D. The Gaudas whom Kṛṣṇa II 'humbled' or 'schooled' were therefore the rulers of 'Hindustan' in the narrow sense, or in other words the Gurjaras themselves."¹

Most of these opinions expressed here by Mr. Jackson can be clearly shown to be absolutely wrong. In the first place, as regards the tenth century, no serious historian now doubts that the Gauda emperor Devapāla who was the son of Raṇṇādevī, a sister of Kṛṣṇa II,² belonged to Bengal and not to the Gonda district of Cunningham or Thanesar of Mr. Jackson, so that this point need not be expatiated upon.

Devapāla is called Gaudeśvara in Gurava Miśra's inscription on the Garuḍa-pillar at Bādal in the Dinajpur district in northern Bengal,³ and the Gaudas whom Kṛṣṇa II could have taught a lesson were the people under this relative of his. In the Baroda Grant of 812 A.D.—no doubt he refers to the Baroda copper-plates, dated 734 Śaka-samvat of Fāstrakūta Karka II—Gaudendra and Taṅgapati are separately mentioned,⁴ because north western and eastern Bengal formed different kingdoms at the time, while the very fact that they are mentioned together shows that these kings were close neighbours. Their defeat by the Pratihāra-Gurjara king Vatsarāja had evidently been obtained before Gopāla, the founder of the Pāla dynasty of Bengal, consolidated Gauda, Vaṅga and Magadha into one great empire.

The Rājataranginī offers clear proof that so far west as in Kashmir also in the eighth and ninth centuries of the Christian era, Gauda was considered to be in Bengal and we must remember, as Stein observes,¹ that Kalhana is very reliable and precise as a guide to the scenes of his narrative. Thus we read of King Lalitāditya who reigned in the early years of the eighth century, that on his expedition of conquest, after vanquishing Yaśovarman of Kānyakubja, "his army proceeded with ease to the Eastern Ocean. His elephants, which there saw the land of their birth, were only with difficulty induced by the abuse of their impatient drivers to march on from the Kaliṅga country. Numberless elephants joined him from the Gauda lands as if attracted by friendship for the elephant [carrying] the couch of Lakṣmī, who was attached [to the king]. When his advanced troops reached the Eastern Ocean, it seemed as if the trunks of the hosts of his war-elephants grasped in the waves the hair of the Ocean." Here we find that Gauda was near the Eastern Ocean in the neighbourhood of the Kaliṅga country, so that it was no doubt Bengal. In the same chapter, Kalhana also speaks of the assassination of the Gauda King who had sought refuge in Kashmir and of the wonderful bravery shown by that King's followers.² Again we are told that Lalitāditya's grandson, Jayāpīda who reigned in the last half of the eighth century, while travelling incognito "entered the city of Paundravardhana, subject to the Kings of Gauda and [at that time] protected by a prince called Jayanta,"¹ and further that Jayāpīḍa married the daughter of Jayanta and showed there his valour by defeating even without preparation, the five Gauda chiefs, and by making his father-in-law their sovereign."² Here the fact that the Gaudas were ruling at Paundravardhana shows that the Gauda country was there in Bengal. Whether these events are to be regarded as based upon actual historical facts, or as creations of the poet's fancy, there can be no doubt that there was some historical tradition behind it and it is clear that there were some relations between Kashmir and Gauda in the eighth and ninth centuries and that this Gauda was in Bengal.

Coming to the seventh century we have the evidence of Harṣacarita wherein we find that Rājyavardhana of Thaneswar which Mr. Jackson considers to be identical with the Gauda country, was killed by the Gauda-king (Gaudādhipa)³ Śaśāṅka, who, Yuan Chwang tells us, was the ruler of Karnasuvarna in Bengal. There can therefore be no room for doubting that in the seventh century A. C. Gauda was a part of Bengal.

That Gauda meant Bengal in the sixth century also is proved to a certainty by the Haraha inscription

He thus gives a correct position for Gauda and Vaṅga, and the Taneshar of Mr. Jackson is not Gauda but Guda, which again, is only the second half of the name of a country the full designation of which according to Varāhamihira⁵ was Pāṇḍuguda, as may be seen from the way in which Bhattotpala reads the passage in his celebrated commentary on the Brhatsamhitā;⁶ the error of dividing the single name into two is most probably not of Albiruni who

The same location of Gauda is also assigned in the work of Parāśara (one of the very early Indian astronomers) who enumerates the countries in the east in the order Utkala, Puṇḍra, Karvaṭa, Samatata, Udra, and Gaudaka.² Certainly this indicates clearly, without any doubt, that with the guidance of Parāśara we have to look for Gaudaka in the same region as Puṇḍra, Samatata, and Udra, that is, in Bengal and not in the Gonda district. We must also here note carefully what Kern points out with regard to Parāśara's work : "Interesting for the geography of India is an entire chapter which Varāhamihira only changing the form, but leaving the matter almost intact, has given in the 14th chapter of Bṛihat Samhitā ; therefore we have to consider that chapter as really representing the geography of Parāśara tantra or perhaps yet more ancient works."³ Parāśara's exact date cannot be ascertained but as he places the Yavanas,—Greeks—in south-western India, he probably belongs to the period about the beginning of the Christian era to which period Kern assigns Garga, another ancient astronomer of the same type as Parāśara.

In the fourth century before Christ we meet with a mention of Gauda in the Arthasāstra of Kautilya who describes a variety of silver called "Gaudika which is the product of a country known as Gauda.”¹ The ancient commentary of Bhaṭṭasvāmin here explains that Kautilya speaks of the silver of Gauda which must have been Bengal.² Gaulikam or Gaulikam was the silver from Kāmarūpa (Kāmarupajam). Here his geography is a little faulty like that of Yaśodhara who calls the Gaudas, as we have seen before, a Pācya people living in Kāmarūpa. Evidently to commentators living in the far south or west, the distance between Bengal and Kāmarūpa which are contiguous countries, was immaterial, especially as the boundaries varied quite often with the advent of every ambitious monarch. The commentators prove at least the fact that according to Indian tradition, Gauda was in the East and not in the region near Thaneswar or Gonda. We may also observe that Kautilya's name for Kāmarūpa is Pāra-Lauhitya,³ or ‘the Trans-Lauhitya country’—the country on the other side of the Brahmaputra. Evidently therefore Kautilya's Gauda was not Kāmarūpa, but must have been the same as the Gauda of Parāśara who was not much removed from him in date.

It must now be amply clear that the country that was known as Gauda in ancient times, was a part of Bengal and it seems more than probable that it is in Bengal also that we have to locate the Gaudapura of Pāṇini⁴ who says that when the words Ariṣṭa and Gauda stand before the word pura so as to form the words Ariṣṭapura, and Gaudapura, the acute accent is placed on the final syllable of the first member. The only pura or city bearing the name of Gauda at any time was situated in Bengal. No city of the same name occurs in the Gonda district or anywhere else in India.

The only passage that shows the existence of a Gauda country in the Gonda district is found in a verse that

A Gauda-śa near Śrāvastī is mentioned only in some Purāṇas

Viṣṇu, Bhāgavata etc., speaks of the foundation of Śrāvastī by king Śrāvasta but does not mention the Gauda-deśa.

This Gauda therefore must have been merely a Sanscritization by some writers of the local name Gonda and hence it is no wonder that it was very rarely used in literature. It is nowhere found in any record of historical importance whether literary or Gauda par excellence in Bengal. It is remarkable that in Buddhist literature where Śrāvastī and the country around is frequently referred to, Gauda is nowhere mentioned.

The Gauda of Kaṭilya and early geographical works and of inscriptions was no doubt, in Bengal; it acquired a great political importance since the later Gupta times, and even before that, formed a well-known province of Eastern India. There is every reason to believe that the G a u ḍ a p u r a of Pāṇini was the capital of this Gauda country.

In culture the Gaudas had won a distinct position for themselves in early times and created an independent style of poetic composition—the Gaudī-rīti, and it is positively certain that Gauda here refers to Bengal and not the Gonda district.

Gaudī-Rīti of Rhetoricians is the style of Bengal

We have already seen Bāṇabhaṭṭa speak of Śiśūka, the king of Bengal (Kamysuvarṇa of Yuan Chwang) as Gaudādhipa. When the same author in one of the introductory verses¹ to his Harsacarita speaks of the fondness for a display of sonorous words (akṣara-dambara) as the characteristic of the people of Gauda, he cannot mean by the word any other country than Bengal. Dandin, the author of the Kāryādarśa, who also is generally supposed to have flourished about the same time as Bāṇa, i.e., the seventh century after Christ, expatiates at some length on the differences of the two styles of Vidarbha and Gauda and besides, speaks of them as the Southern (Dāksinātya) and the Eastern (Paurastya) styles.² This characterisation of the Gaudī as the Paurastya or the Eastern style shows that the Gauda of Dandin must have been in Eastern India and without doubt, Bengal, in as much as we find his contemporary, Bāṇa, placing Gauda in Bengal.

A comparison with the Nāṭyaśāstra of Bharata and the Kāryamīmāṃsā of Rājaśekhara leaves, moreover, no room for doubt that Gaudī-rīti was the style of Bengal. Thus the Nāṭyaśāstra which is much earlier than Kāryādarśa, mentions four styles (prarṛttis),—Āvanti, Pañcāla-madhyamā, Dākṣiṇātyā and Oḍra-Māgadhī,¹ of which the last two correspond to the Vaidarbhi and Gaudī styles of *Dandin*² and it is apparent that what Bharata calls Oḍra-Māgadhī or the style of Orissa-Magadha is called Gaudī or Paurastyā by Dandin, and Bharata expressly tells us that his Oḍra-Māgadhī flourished in Bengal, Orissa, Magadha, Prāgjyotiṣa, Tāmralipta and the adjoining countries'. That this Oḍra-Māgadhī is identical with Gaudī is made clear by Rājasekhara who shows the connection between the earlier and the later ways of enumeration; he says that in the countries Aṅga, Vaṅga, Suhma, Brahma, Pundra, etc. the Oḍra-Māgadhī Prarṛtti and the Gaudīyā Riti were prevalent and he cites in this connection a verse describing the Gauḍa ladies (Gāṇḍāṅgaṇūsa).⁴ There can, therefore be no doubt that the G a u ḍ ī - r ī t i of the rhetoricians refers to B e n g a l.

The country of Paundra is not mentioned by Vātsyāyana, but is once referred to by the Commentary to illustrate the sport of Kadam̐a-yuddha in which, it is said that instead of the soft balls of Kadamba-flower, the Paundras used sticks and stones¹. Mitbilā is similarly mentioned by the commentator in connection with a local sport².

The only other place that Vātsyāyana mentions in Eastern India is Pāṭaliputra at the request of the courtesans of which city, Dattaka composed his monograph on the section of the Kāmasāstra dealing with them³. Beside this, Yasodhara, the Commentator, considers Pāṭaliputra to be implied by the term Nagara in two passages of Vātsyāyana, it being perhaps, in his opinion, the 'nagara' par excellence: thus he explains the word Nāgarikyah in a passage by *Pāṭaliputrikyah*⁴, and Nāgarakāḥ in another, by *Pāṭaliputrakāḥ*⁵. Yasodhara has not stated on what authority, or from what considerations, he was led to offer this explanation, but bearing in mind his poor knowledge of the geography of Eastern India, as we have seen before, this identification is not worthy of any serious consideration. We can, therefore, have no hesitation in rejecting his identification as a mere haphazard guess. Besides, the very fact that Vātsyāyana mentions Pāṭaliputra expressly when speaking of Dattaka, precludes the supposition that he should use another word when speaking of the same place in a different part of the same book. We shall presently discuss the question of the location of Vātsyāyana's Nagara.

Another country which was apparently in the Prācya division is Gonarda, implied in the name Gonardīya of Gonarda in Eastern India one of the predecessors of Vātsyāyana¹. It is doubtful, as we have already pointed out², whether this Gonardīya is the same as the grammarian Gonardīya and Kielhorn is most probably right in holding that the latter cannot be the same person as Patañjali, the author of the *Mahābhāṣya*³. The country of Gonarda is located by some Indian scholars in Kashmir, and by others in Oudh⁴. The first view has its origin probably in a fancied connection with the Kashmir kings called *Gonanda*⁵, or rather Gonarda, as they are more correctly styled by Kalhana⁶. There is no reason to think that Gonarda was the Punjab as Mr. N. L. Dey does, because it was conquered by Gonarda of Kashmir⁷. All that we can say with certainty about the location of Gonarda is that it is a country in the Eastern Division of India. The Kāśikā-vṛtti gives the example Gonardīya in illustration of the rule of Pāṇini according to which the suffix 'cha' is aded to names of Prācya countries whose first vowel is 'e' or 'o'. mentions Gonarda as a country in the Prācyā or Eastern division along with Prāgjyotiṣa, Puṇḍra, Videha, Tāmralipta, Magadha etc¹. . . The same statement is also found in the Brahmāṇḍapurāṇa ². Varāhamihira, however, places Gonarda in the south³ but the location in Eastern India seems to be the correct one, as it is supported by the Kāśikāvṛtti, and its situation near Ayodhyā would tally with this view.

Southern India is designated by Vātsyāyana both as Dakṣiṇapatha as well as Dākṣiṇītya, and in some cases, he speaks in general of the Dākṣiṇātyas or the people of the South, while in other passages he mentions some of the individual provinces making up the southern region. With regard to the area comprised in the Southern Division, the Commentator explains that the country to the south of the river Narmada or Nerbudda was called *Dakṣiṇāpatha*⁴; this agrees well with the limit fixed by Rājasêkhara in his Kāvya-mīmāṃsā where we are told that Dakṣiṇapatha lies to the south of the city of Māhiṣmatī, that is, Mandhata on the Nerbudda⁵; Bharata in his Nāṭyaśāstra which belongs to about the same period as *Kāmasūtra*⁶ also gives a definition of Dakṣiṇāpatha which virtually agrees with the above: he says that Dakṣiṇapatha is the area containing the mountains Mahendra, Malaya, Sahya etc, and besides, that the Dākṣiṇītya or the southern style (pravr̥tti) is found in vogue in all the countries between the Vindhya and the Southern Sea'.

Daksināpatha is mentioned by Vātsyāyana in connection with the custom of marriage with the daughter of the maternal uncle in that region² and the Dāksinātyas are referred to four times. One peculiar custom of the South is referred to by him as consisting of something like circumcision³. Vātsyāyana refers to the peculiar way in which the Dāksinātyas dress their finger-nails as distinguished from the Gaudas, while the Mahārāstrakas, he assures us, follow a middle course⁴. The Dāksinātyas, says Vātsyāyana, are also characterised by a fondness for delivering artistic strokes at ladies in their amorous sports as an expression of strong passion⁵. This was a local custom with them and Vātsyāyana gives several examples from the court life of the South. The women of the South, says he, bear on their bodies marks of these strokes⁶ which sometimes were so violent as to deprive them of their lives. It was by just such a stroke--the K a r t a r i imparted on the head—that Kuntala Śatakarni Śātavāhana killed his chief queen, Malayavatî,¹ the Chola king killed the courtesan, Citrasena, by a similar stroke on the chest, called Kīla in the technical language of the Kāmasūtra,² and a stroke, the V i d d h ā, aimed at the forehead of a dancing girl by Naradeva, who, as the Commentary informs us, was Chief of the Pāṇḍya king's forces, made her lose an eye.³ Besides, he refers to an evil practice of the Dākṣiṇātyas

Besides the general mention of the people of the Deccan, Vatsyavāna delineates some peculiarities in the character of the women of Dravida (Dravida and Vānāvāsī dyah)⁴ and Vānāvāsī (Vānāvāsikyah)⁵ Yasodhara, whose ignorance of the geography of the East, as we have seen, was quite lamentable, shows an accurate knowledge of the location of the countries of the South. Thus he says, the Dravida Viśaya was to the south of the Karnāṭa country (Kanara of modern days) and the Vanavasa-viśaya, he says, was to the east of the province of Koṅkana.⁶ In connection with this mention of Vanavāsī by Vātsyayana Mahamahopādhyāya Haraprasad Sastri in his lectures on Magadhan Literature has expressed the opinion that the ancient name, Vaijayanti, "became Vanavasi about the beginning of the Christian era''', and thence he derives an argument in favour of his theory that Vātsyāyana is to be placed in the first century A. C. But we find from inscriptions that the name Vaijayantī continued for several centuries of the Christian era. Thus we find Viṇhukaḍa-Guṭukulānanda Sātakanni calls himself V a i j a y a n t ī—p u r a - r ā j ā in an inscription on a pillar in front of the Kallesvara temple at Malavalli in the Shikarpur Taluka of Mysore.' As Fleet observes, "This king of Vaijayantī, that is Banawasi in the North Kanara district, Bombay, may be referred to any time in or about the first or second century A. D.'" In a later inscription on the same pillar the Kadamba king, Śivakhada-Vamma or Śivaskandavarman calls himself the 'lord of Vaijayantī' and Rice has "marked its date as about 250 A. D."

Vātsyāyana also mentions V i d a r ḃ h a or Berar twice in his work in connection with the abuses in the king's harem², and the Commentary explains that the country to the south of Kālānjara was called Vidarbha³. Another people, the V a t s a g u l m a s are also mentioned in the same connection as the Vaidarbhas and are to some extent characterised by similar abuses ; among both these peoples, we are informed by Vātsyāyana, beautiful women were sent to the king's harem'. This agreement is not to be wondered at, in as much as we learn from Rājaśekhara's Kāvya-mīmāṃsā that Vatsagulma was a city in the Vidarbha and that it was a favourite haunt of the god of love¹. The Commentator, Yaśodhara, says that in the Dakṣiṇapatha there were two brothers called Vatsa and Gulma, and the country where they lived was designated Vatsagulma². Evidently he had no personal knowledge of the place and his information was gathered from some such work as Kṣemendra's Brhatkathāmañjarī where we are told that Somasarma, a Dākṣiṇātya Brahmin had two sons named Vatsa and Gulma³ whose nephew (sister's son) was Guṇadhya, the author of the Brhatkatha, the great storehouse of stories in Pāṣāṇī Prakrit. The same story is told also in the *Kathāsaritsagara*⁴, and the two brothers Vatsa and Gulma are also mentioned there; but in neither of these stories is there any record of the foundation of the city, which, as we learn from Rājaśekhara, was situated in Berar. By the time that Yaśodhara wrote his Commentary, the name Vatsagulma must have gone out of use.

The people of the Andhra country, which the Commentator tells us, was in the Dakṣiṇāpatha, to the east of the Kārnāṭa-Viṣaya⁵, is referred to several times. The Andhra ladies are referred to in two passages⁶ and Vātsyāyana speaks of a custom by which a newly married damsel among the Andhras was sent to the king's harem on the tenth day with some presents¹

The Mahārāṣṭrakas whose country is located by Yaśodhara between the Narmadā and the Karmāṭa district², are mentioned in two passages, one of which refers to the method of dressing the finger-nails of the men³ and the other gives some characteristics of the ladies⁴ who are said to have been fond of all the sixty-four Pāñcāla arts.

Another indirect mention of a southern country is that implied in the name of Dāṇḍakya, the Bhoja king who met with extermination along with his whole family and kingdom for ravishing a Brahmin girl⁵. This is one of those passages which have apparently been quoted by Vātsyāyana from the Arthasūtra of Kauṭilya.⁶ The story is related in the Uttarakāṇḍa of *Rāmāyaṇa*⁷ how the flourishing dominions of Dāṇḍakya were changed into the forest of Dandaka. The Bhoja kings ruled in the south not only at the time of Kauṭilya but also much earlier; they go back without any doubt to the age of the Brāhmaṇas, and most probably, even so far back as the R̥gvedic period. Thus we are told by a passage in the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa that in the south, the kings of the Satvats were called Bhojas and a passage in the *R̥gveda*¹ mentions Pākasthāman, the Bhoja; besides, other passages in the R̥gveda and the comments in the Bṛhaddevata on them, show clearly that Bhoja as the designation of a line of kings was well known in the R̥gvedic era².

have the same style as Avantī. Another name for eastern Mālava was Akara as we find from Bṛhat-

of the Satavahanas where we find Akara and Avantī

mentioned side by side¹. These inscriptions and also coins go to show that the two Mālavas were by the first century A.D. included in the empire of the Śāta-vāhanas², but with the disruption of that empire, they must have again become independent, as their separate treatment by Vatsyayana shows.

The A b h î r a s are mentioned prominently. The Abhîra ladies are said to be the same in their likes and dislikes with the ladies of Malava³, and the love intrigues of the ladies in the harems of Abhîra kings are also referred to. In this connection we are told that the Abhîra harem was defended by guards who bore the designation of *Kṣatriyas*⁴, showing that the Abhîras themselves had not yet acquired the status of Kṣatriyas and it seems that these latter were employed as guardians of the royal seraglio, in consideration of the lesser chance of their communication with the ladies than of warders taken from their own clan. An Abhîra Kottarāja or king of Kōṭṭa, which, the Commentator informs us, was a place in Gurjarata (modern Gujrat) is mentioned as an illustration of the dangers to kings in entering the houses of others on love intrigues. The Commentary gives the detail that this Abhîra king had entered the house of Śreṣṭhî Vasumitra to meet his wife, and there he was assassinated by a washerman employed by the king's brother who had a claim to the throne⁵.

Saurāṣṭrakas, or the people of Surāstra, that is, the peninsula of Kathiawar, are mentioned in connection with the practice of the city as well as the country women among them, of living in the royal harem either individually or in a body for sporting with the king¹. Lāṭa or Northern Kathiawar is referred to twice,—some characteristics of the ladies of Lāṭa being given in one passage² and those of the men in another³.

The people of Aparānta are referred to several times; in one passage the Aparānta ladies are said to resemble those of Lāṭa⁴, and another refers to an immoral custom prevalent among the Aparānta people that they sent their own handsome wives to kings and high officers in order to win their favour⁵. A third passage states that in Aparānta, the king's harem was not so strictly guarded as in other parts of India⁶. As regards the location of the province, the Commentary says that the Aparānta country was situated near the Western Sea. It is now generally considered to be "Northern Konkan with a capital at Sūrparaka (now Sopārā)"⁷ but very often the name appears to have been applied to designate a much wider region from Malabar to Sindh. He makes Raghu cross the Sahya range or the Western Ghats between the two peaks Malaya and Dardura¹ which are no doubt Dodabetta in the Nilgiri District and the Anaimalai hills of which the highest is the Anaimudi peak : here is in fact the well-known Palghat gap which forms the only wide opening through the Western Ghats in these regions and through which the Railway line crosses the Ghats. Next, we are told that Raghu's immense army, bent upon conquering the Aparanta country, filled up, as it were, the narrow strip of land between the Ghats and the Sea, and the very next verse takes us to Kerala characterised by its noble palms² and extending, in its widest signification, as far north as Kangarote river near Goa in North Kanara³. Immediately after this, the poet speaks of the date palms which flourish most in the north, especially in the dry, arid regions of Sindh and in the verse following, he again speaks of the sea paying tribute to Raghu through the kings of Aparānta⁴. Apparently therefore the whole western coast from Kerala up to Sindh was included in Kālidāsa's Aparānta. Sir R. G. Bhandarkar was the first to identify Aparānta with the western coast : he says, "Aparānta must be the western coast below the Sahyādri ; for, Kālidāsa represents Raghu, in the fourth canto of the Raghuvamsa to have crossed the Sahya to conquer that country, and to have by means of his immense army made the sea appear 'as if it touched the Sahya mountain.'" Dr. Bhagavanlal Indraji following him, says, "It corresponds with modern Konkanā, the district extending from Gokarna in the Karwar collectorate to the Damān Gaṅgā, the frontier river of Gujrāt, or perhaps even further north to the Tāpī."² He quotes in support of his statement a passage from the Commentary to the Kāmasūtra and a passage in the Mahābhārata, where it is asserted that Arjuna visited all the holy places in Aparānta up to Prabhāsa in Kāthiāwār. Dr. G. Bühler in a note also accorded his agreement with this view.⁴ Pundit Indraji also observes⁵ on the authority of the Viśvakoṣa quoted by Mallinatha that Śūrpāraka or Sopārā was the capital of Aparānta. Dr. Burgess also agrees with this view.⁶

On the evidence offered by the Aparānta coins, however, General Cunningham shows Aparānta to extend farther north and also to include territories considerably inland. Thus Cunningham observes, "Aparāntika is placed by Varāhamihira in the western division of India along with Sindhu-Sauvira and Pañcanada, or Sindh and the Punjab.”¹ He further argues, “The coins of the Aparāntikas, bearing the inscription Aparatasa Maharajasa, were found chiefly in Rajputana about Nimach and Ajmer, by Colonel Stacy, while my own specimens have been obtained in north Rajputana and Mathura. For these reasons I conclude that the country known as Aparāntika or “West Land,” was actually in the west of India, and that it did not extend geographically to the south of the Narbadā. Politically Sopārā and other places to the south of that river may have been included.” But this is not the view of Kālidāsa as we have shown above. Yet, at the same time, it has to be admitted that Cunningham’s argument has much force. Fleet also points out that “One of the Aśoka edicts classes the Yavanas, Kambojas and Gandhāras as Āparānta,” and thinks that Aparānta includes “the Konkan, with also Northern Gujrat, Kathiawad, Cutch and Sindh.”² But as we have shown above, Kalidasa takes it further south and includes the whole of the Malabar coast in it. It is difficult to say what region exactly is meant by Vātsyāyana but we can form a guess from the context in which it occurs. In the group of sūtras where Aparānta occurs, Vātsyāyana is illustrating a local custom (Deśapravṛtti), and all the people that he mentions belong to south-western India : thus they occur in the order—Andhras (whose dominions had before the days of Vātsyāyana extended to the western coast and Mālava), the Vatsagulmas and the Vidarbhas, (both of whom belong to Berar), the Aparāntas and lastly the Saurāṣṭrakas. Aparānta of Vātsyāyana appears therefore to be the western coast including the Konkan and extending to the south of Kathiawar. It did not include Saurāṣṭra, nor Sindh in as much as the Saindhavas are mentioned separately.

These latter are only once mentioned in connection with the love affairs of the ladies in the king's harem.¹ The Commentary informs us that the Saindhava people dwelt in the land to the west of the Indus.²

The question now remains for us to determine the position of Nagara referred to in Vātsyāyana's Nāgarikyāḥ and Nāgarakāḥ. The Commentary is certainly right in holding that they are proper names referring to a particular place

Nagara—a
City in present
Jaipur State

and are not used in the literal sense of 'the women or men of a city' in general, and this will be evident from the context in which they occur. In neither of the cases is there any contrast between the town and the village. Both the words are used in connection with other proper names, the former in the order—Andhryāḥ, Māhārāṣṭrikyāḥ, Nāgarikyāḥ, Drāvidyāḥ, Vānavāsikyāḥ etc., and the latter in the order Āhicchatrikāḥ, Sāketāḥ, *Nāgarakāḥ*³. In the second case it is found that the names are those of well-known towns, Āhicchatra, the capital of the North Pañcāla and Sāketa or Ayodhyā, and the conclusion becomes irresistible that Nagara is also the name of a particular town, and as we have seen that Vātsyāyana is more familiar with Western India than with the other parts of the country, we are led to expect Nagara in this region. We find here 'the great ancient city of Nagara'⁴ the ruins of which now lie scattered over an area of nearly four square miles in extent in the territory of the Mahārājā of Jeypore, 25 miles to the south-south east of

There is another ancient city Nāgarī or Tambabatī Nagari (about eleven miles north of Chitore) which has been identified with the Madhyamikā of Patañjali⁴; this city might also claim identity with Vātsyāyana’s Nagara, but I think the former is the more probable one, as the latter was evidently called Majhamikī or *Madhyamikā*⁵ about the beginning of the Christian era, and probably also a few centuries later. Pāṇini appears to have known Nagara as the name of a particular city as it appears in the Gana or group kattryādi referred to in one of his Sūtras⁶. The Kāśikā commentary enumerates fifteen names as belonging to this class. That the word Nagara in this list is older than the Kāśikā and is a proper

6 कत्त्रादिभ्यो ढकन् Pāṇini, iv. 2, 95. Prof. D.R. Bhandarkar who first drew attention to this sūtra, says in the Indian Antiquary, 1911, p. 34 footnote 45, “Nagara as the name of a town, was known to the author of Kāśikā.” He considers Nagarkot or Kāngṛā as the Nagara from which the Nāgar Brāhmanas derived their name.

name, appears from what the Kāśikā says in connection with another sūtra of Pāṇini (IV. 2, 128); it states that Nagara is read in the Kattryādi group as the designation of a particular city as it occurs in company with other such names there.¹ From a city called Nagara also the Nāgari alphabet might have derived its name. The existence of a city called Nagara therefore cannot be questioned. There is, however, no justification for holding that the Nagara we have referred to was the city where Vātsyāyana composed his work, it being only one of the many places that he has mentioned in illustrating his sūtras; the utmost that we can say is that from the uncompromising and straightforward manner in which he has exposed the evils practised by the king's officials and queens, he must have belonged to a Gaṇa-rājya or a democratic government like the city of the Mālavas described above. This is also apparent from the importance he attaches to the assembly of citizens (nāgarikasamavāya) alluded to before.

It is hopeless to attempt to decide definitely which part of India Vātsyāyana belonged to. Some scholars (including Mahamahopādhyāya Haraprasād Śāstri) hold that Vātsyāyana wrote his Kāmasūtra at the city of Pāṭaliputra, but there is hardly any justification for this belief in the book itself. It depends mainly upon the Commentator's identification of Vātsyāyana's Nagara with Pāṭaliputra which, as we have seen, is absolutely without any foundabe Nāgarika as the correct form of derivative to designate a citizen of the particular Nagara, but Vātsyāyana has apparently not followed Pāṇini here, perhaps in deference to popular practice. The Kāśikā in accordance with the sūtra of Pāṇini here lays down that the form Nāgaraka is derived from Nagara to signify a base or expert knowledge (कुत्सन-प्रावीण्ययोः), otherwise, it will be Nāgara, and the example tion. It is remarkable that Vātsyāyana has got nothing to say of the people of Magadha. In his days, Magadha was still a great country and not extinct like Pañcāla, and its capital was still the greatest city in India. There is, therefore, no reason why Vātsyāyana should not mention the characteristics of the people of Magadha, as he has done with regard to those of other parts of India. It is argued by some (who favour the theory of Vātsyāyana being a man of Pāṭaliputra himself), that he did not like to calumniate his own people by expatiating on their sexual abuses. But this argument cannot hold, inasmuch as our author has not everywhere enumerated mere defects or abuses, but has not unoften delineated simple and faultless customs and habits without the least suggestion of any evil in them. It was open to him to bring out the good points in their character, as he has done in the case of the men and women of Gauḍa. We cannot think of any other reason than personal ignorance of the country of Magadha and its people for this omission on the part of Vātsyāyana. MM. Haraprasād Śāstrī has pointed out that in the introduction to the Harṣacarita, Bāṇa who belonged to the Vātsyāyana-gotra says that his ancestors dwelt at some place in Magadha and hence he has argued that all the Vātsyāyanas in literature must have belonged to the same country¹. This is a large generalisation which it is hard to accede to. There are Brahmins of the Śāṇḍilya-gotra now in Bengal; it would hardly be a sane conclusion to derive from this fact that all the Śāṇḍilyas that lived at any time in India were Bengalees, that the author of the Śāṇḍilya-sūtras, for example, hailed from Bengal. Our Vātsyāyana was separated from Bāṇabhaṭṭa by about four centuries, and according to the findings of the Mahāmahopādya himself, by not less than six. Is it not rather rash to imagine that they belonged to the same family located in the same spot for these many hundreds of years ?

Now, we observe that though Vātsyāyana possesses more or less knowledge of all parts of India, yet he appears to have been acquainted more thoroughly with South-Western India than with the other portions. Of the country from Rajputana to the south up to the Konkan coast, he speaks of almost all the various provinces and peoples. For example, he speaks of A v a n t ī and M ā l a v a (i.e. Eastern and Western Mālava), A p a r ā n t a, L ā ṭ a, S a u r ā ṣ ṭ r a, V i d a r b h a, M a h ā r ā ṣ ṭ r a, etc., he mentions twice the V a t s a g u l m a k a s of Berar and the A n d h r a s and the Ā b h ī r a s are mentioned again and again, and he treats them with a wealth of detail which is not observed in his delineation of the peoples in other parts of India. Of the countries to the North-West he speaks of the people of Sindh and the Punjab and of some customs of the B ā h l ī k a country or Bactria. The people in the South he knows only as the D ā k ṣ i ṇ ā t y a s and their country as D a k ṣ i ṇ ā p a t h a and he once mentions the D r ā v i ḍ a s and only incidentally a Colarāja. The people in the East he speaks of as the P r ā c y a s, "the Eastern people," though he seems to know the G a u ḍ a s and makes a collective mention of Vaṅgāṅgakalinga in one passage. He does not, as we have seen, even once speak of Magadha, nor does he notice any characteristics of the people of its capital, and of the entire country from Magadha to Rajputana he has very little to say. Once only he speaks of the M a d h y a ṇ e ś a and once each of the Ś a u r a s e n a s, S ā k e t a and A h i c c h a t r a.

This meagre mention of the countries of the central and eastern portions of Northern India and the detailed description of the customs of Western India makes it abundantly clear that Vātsyāyana had personal knowledge of the western portion alone, and that his information about the eastern regions was derived probably from the works of his predecessors like the treatise on the Vaiśika section of the science of Erotics by Dattaka of Pāṭaliputra. That Vātsyāyana belonged to Western India may also be guessed from the fact that he makes a large number of quotations from Āpastamba's *Grhyasūtra*¹ as we have shown before, and it is known that the Vedic school of the Āpastambins flourished in Western India, specially in the land of the Andhras.²

CHAPTER III

CASTES AND OCCUPATIONS

Vātsyāyana in the Kāmasūtra, presents a beautifully vivid and realistic picture of various aspects of social life in India about seventeen hundred years ago. Though mainly concerned with erotics, yet he throws light on many an obscure side of Indian society, furnishing facts and circumstances hardly available from any other source. From his work we get a picture of ancient Indian society under the operation of the Varnāśrama Dharma of the religious law-books and while discussing the ideals and forms of marriage, Vātsyāyana gives us an insight into the actual life of the young people, their loves and jealousies, their courtship and coquetry. He depicts the gay life of the Nāgaraka, the city-bred man of fashion of his days—his house and gardens, his daily round of pleasures, his sports and festivities, his many-sided culture and refinement. He furnishes a picture of the Indian home, of the sweet, pure and devoted Indian wife, the mistress of the household and controller of the family purse. From Vātsyāyana also we can glean an account of the arts and crafts that flourished in this age of fine æsthetic tastes and artistic pursuits, and we see how the artiste, the gaṇikā, by virtue of her intellectual accomplishments and skill in the fine arts, occupied a position of no mean importance in society. At the same time, we realise that the merry life depicted in Vātsyāyana's work, representing, as it does, but one side of the entire Indian social structure, supplements the picture as obtained from the Dharmaśāstras, and the ideal life, according to Vātsyāyana, is one in which the three elements of dharma, artha and kāma are harmoniously blended together.

As in the Dharmaśāstras and the other sacred literature of India, we find, in Vātsyāyana's work, Indian society founded upon the fourfold classification of the entire people into v a r ṇ a s

or castes, and the fourfold division of the life of each individual into ā ś r a m a s or stages. Vātsyāyana himself declares that the very existence of the social structure is effected by the observance of the rules rendered obligatory for the maintenance of the institutions of varṇa and āśrama;¹ and though the subject Vātsyāyana has to deal with, does not offer many occasions for expatiating upon these matters, yet it is amply clear from casual references in the work that it was a society controlled by the varṇāśrama system that Vātsyāyana was depicting. Thus when referring to the various ways in which Vātsyāyana's beau idéal, the Nāgaraka, was to acquire the wealth necessary for leading his life in ease and comfort, Vātsyāyana enumerates four methods of earning money,

The Four

viz., acceptance of gifts (prati-graha), conquest (janya), trade (kraya) and wages (nirveśa).² Of these, as the Commentary points out, prati-graha or acceptance of gifts is the standard means of subsistence for a Brahmin³;

of the six kinds of work which according to Manu a Brahmin may partake in, three enable him to earn a living, as Manu points out himself, viz., sacrificing for others (yājana), teaching (adhyāpana) and the acceptance of gifts from pure men (pratigraha)¹ and of these three again, if looked at closely, the last viz., pratigraha, is evidently the actual means of earning money in the case of sacrificing and teaching also, as the remuneration offered in most cases was voluntary. Vātsyāyana who was trying to condense these matters into as few words as possible in his pithy paradigms, has spoken of pratigraha only as the means of acquiring a fortune in the case of Brahmins, that being essentially the only method for the purpose.

In the case of the Kṣatriya, similarly, Manu declares that the bearing of arms is the means of subsistence², so that Vātsyāyana's conquest (jaya) is practically equivalent to it. In the same way, of the three approved means of subsistence prescribed for the Vaiśya, viz., trade, rearing of cattle and agriculture³, trade is the essential element, as the produce from cattle and agriculture have to be bartered to bring money. Lastly, in the case of the Śūdra, we find Manu ordaining for him the earning of a living as an artisan or craftsman⁴ which is the same as the nirveśa or working for wages of Vātsyāyana. This fourfold division of the means of earning money according to birth, shows that in Vātsyāyana's time, occupation was controlled by the caste in which one was born. In connection with another important matter of life also, viz., marriage, Vātsyāyana speaks of the four castes, of higher and lower castes, and also on the advisability of the union between men and women of the same caste (savarṇa) as we shall show in the next chapter.

The Brāhmaṇas he mentions several times and as receiving special respect. Blessings vouchsafed by good Brāhmaṇas are to be coveted by everyone, says Vātsyāyana, as a source of long life and renown¹. The gift of a thousand cows to Brāhmaṇas is considered to be one of the highest aims in life of a lady, even in the case of a courtesan when she is rich, although in her case the gift had to be made through a third person, as a direct gift by a fallen woman would not be acceptable to them. Even into the royal harem where the ladies were guarded against intrusion by any male person, the Brāhmaṇa had right of entry and could converse with them separated by a screen². With regard to medical preparations for recovering health or restoring vigour, Vātsyāyana advises the use of those only that are approved of by friends and Brāhmaṇas³, the underlying idea in such recommendations being that the Brāhmaṇa was believed to be unselfish and honest.

The Brāhmaṇas as performing various religious functions and as forming various orders of monks or ascetics, are mentioned by Vātsyāyana : for example, the Śrotriya and the fire maintained constantly in his house for offering daily sacrifices, are referred to several times in the chapter on marriage¹, and besides, in other places. Moreover, we find a mention of the Brahmacārin, the Dīkṣita or the man initiated to perform a sacrifice, the Vratin or the man who has taken a special vow, and the Lingin or person who like the Sannyāsin of later times, has adopted certain special dress and marks². The Commentary explains the Lingin as the Parivrājaka—the wandering ascetic who has renounced the world³.

Vātsyāyana's work amply demonstrates the fact that sacrificial performances still formed an important element in the Brahmanical faith, in as much as the setting up of large and costly fire-places or Agni-caityas is considered a popular form of public service along with the erection of temples, excavation of tanks, laying of parks and building of bridges etc.⁴ The sacrificial performances on a large scale (yajña) afforded one of the common occasions on which it was permissible for ladies to go out of their inner apartments (antahpura)⁵ to take part in the public or private festivities. Again the utility of religious or scientific treatises (Śāstra) for the performance of concrete practical works like sacrifices (yajñas)¹, is referred to by Vātsyāyana, and moreover, he adds that priests officiating at sacrifices (yājñikāḥ), even though ignorant of grammar, were able to apply at the sacrificial rites (Kratus) the principle of ū h a or drawing of inference which depends upon a knowledge of grammar. These sacrificial festivities which the maidens went out of their homes to join, also afforded opportunities, according to Vātsyāyana, to a youngman for choosing his partner for life and winning the love of the girl of his selection². At the sacrificial festivities again, the amorous lover sought for an opportunity of arranging a rendezvous with his mistress with the help of a female go-between. Thus we observe that Gṛhya or household sacrifices like those performed at the household fire of the Śrotriyas, as well as the more elaborate Śrauta rites on a large scale, formed common occurrences in the society that Vātsyāyana depicts.

Of the second caste in the social order, we find the Rājā playing a prominent part in society in Vātsyāyana's days, but it is evident that the Rājā or king, though generally a Kṣatriya, was not unoften derived from other classes like the Ābhīras, and sometimes perhaps he was a Brahmin. The word Kṣatriya is used by Vātsyāyana only once, and even there, as the special designation of a class of guards employed by the Ābhīra monarchs. This passage tells us that the seraglios of the Ābhīra kings were guarded by sentries who bore the designation of *Kṣatriyas*¹. This shows apparently that the Ābhīras themselves were not Kṣatriyas, but were outside the fourfold classification of Indian society, and that they employed these Kṣatriyas considering them to be more trustworthy in guarding the harem than their own tribesmen.

The Vaiśyas and the Śūdras are not expressly mentioned by Vātsyāyana, but we have seen that their caste occupations are referred to by him, and besides, he mentions a number of artisans and craftsmen whose occupations are in some way connected with the life of luxury and ease that the Nāgaraka led. These are the Mālākāra—‘the maker of garlands’, the Gāṇḍhika—‘the perfumer’, the Rajaka and the Nīlīkusumbharañjaka—‘the dyer and the cleaner of clothes’, the Nāpita—‘the barber’, the Śaṇḍika—‘the vendor of spirituous liquors’, the Tāmbūlikā—‘the seller of betel leaves’, the Suvarṇika or Suvarṇakāra—‘the goldsmith’, the Manikāra—‘the jeweller’, the Vaīkatika—‘the diamond-cutter’, the Kuśilāva—‘the actor’, the Gāyana—‘the singer’ and so on². We may compare with these last the artiste spies of Kaṭilya having opportunities of spying the private character of citizens, viz. the actor (nata), the dancer (Nartaka), the singer (Gayana), the musician (Vādaka), the man who lives on his tongue (Vāgjjivana) and the bard (Kuśīlava)¹. Many of the craftsmen no doubt formed separate castes that varied according to their occupations but were commonly included under the general name of Sūdra. We have a mention of some females that were skilled in the arts, the Śilpakārikā—‘a woman practising the arts’, the Naṭī or Nāṭakīyā—‘the actress’, and the Kalāvidagdhā—‘the female artiste’². Here also we are reminded of Kaṭilya’s Silparatyah striyah,—‘the women proficient in the arts’, who had access to the inner apartments of the people³. He speaks of the Silpakārikā also⁴.

Of the higher professions, we have a reference to the astrologer (Baivañjā)⁵ and the physician (Vaidya)⁶. There is no indication in Vātsyāyana’s work to show whether they formed separate castes. The Vaidya probably occupied a respectable position, in as much as in two passages in the Kāmasūtra, he is mentioned with the Mahāmātra as an influential person and in another passage, the Vaidya is considered to be a person whose favour is worth acquiring by a courtesan⁷. The literature used by the Vaidya, that is the science of medicine is called Vaidyaka by Vātsyāyana and the Āyurveda, or the 'science of life' is also mentioned along with the Veda and the Vidyātantras, i.e. works on various branches of science¹.

Vātsyāyana mentions a number of government officials, but there is nothing to indicate their caste. Their position in society, however, appears to suggest that they must have belonged to the higher castes, but they need not necessarily have belonged to the Brahmin or the Kṣatriya castes. We find that the Rāṣṭriya or governor appointed by the emperor Candragupta Maurya, in Western India, was the Vaisya Puṣyagupta and the man holding the same position in Aśoka's time was the Yavana Tuṣāṇa, while Rudradāman's governor was the Pahlava Suviśākha², of foreign extraction no doubt, but thoroughly Indianised.

In the first place, the Mahāmātra is mentioned many times in the book, side by side with the king, as of a very high position in society. Vātsyāyana, when writing his work, had in mind as his prospective readers the daughters of kings and Mahāmātras who were likely to profit by his book, because in the first place, as he observes, among females it was specially they who received a liberal education—had their intellect sharpened by a study of the literature on a subject (śāstra)³. On festive occasions near the house of the Māhamātra, a lover would try to meet and win over the lady he loved¹ A person who was in the good books of the Mahāmātra was considered a desirable lover by the hetaræ² The favour of the Mahāmātras was sought to be won by men in some parts of India in ways that were far from honorable, and certainly not sanctioned by codes of morality³ Vātsyāyana advises the Mahāmātras never to enter another's house on any amorous expedition, because other people would imitate the conduct of great men like themselves, and he adds that just as the sun, high up in the sky, is watched by all people in his journey across the heavens, similarly the movements of the Mahāmātras are keenly watched by men; therefore they should not do anything that was unworthy or dishonourable. Vātsyāyana also speaks of persons that were harassed by the Mahāmātras⁴ and he speaks in similar terms of the Rajavallabha or the favourite of the king⁵ who was marked generally by violent and sinister conduct. The Mahāmātra of Vātsyāyana appears to be, as in the Arthasāstra of Kauṭilya⁷, a designation for high government officials in general, including provincial governors, as in Aśoka's edicts. Besides the Mahāmātra, Vātsyāyana also mentions the

M a n t r i n on whose shoulders rested the heavy burden of state,¹ as a person who should never have anything to do with filthy practices. This M a n t r i n, the pillar of the state, seems to be the Prime-minister and superior to the Mahāmātras, or he may be a member of the Mantri-pariṣad of Kaṭilya.² Of the superior officers, Vātsyāyana also speaks of the D h a r m a s t h a s or D h a r m ā d h i k a r a ṇ a s t h a s, the dispensers of law and justice³ and four of the A d h y a k ṣ a s or superintendents in charge of the departments of state, beside the U t t a r ā d h y a k ṣ a or a superior officer in general.⁴ These adhyakṣas or departmental superintendents mentioned by Vātsyāyana, are only such as come in contact with women in the ordinary course of their duties and have thus opportunities, as Vātsyāyana avers, of winning their love without much risk to themselves. Such an officer is the G a v ā d h y a k ṣ a who had access to cowherdesses.⁵ The S ū t r ā d h y a k ṣ a, the Superintendent of spinning and weaving, had dealings with widows, helpless women and female mendicants⁷ who spun yarn for the Government and brought it to him for his approval and also for their wages; Kaṭilya gives a fuller list of such women—"Widows, cripple women, mendicant or ascetic women (pravrajitā), women compelled to work in default of paying fines (daṇḍa-pratikārinī), mothers of prostitutes, old women-servants of the king, and prostitutes (deradāsī) who have ceased to attend temples on service, shall be employed to cut wool, fibre, cotton, panicle (tūla), hemp and flax,"¹ The P a ṇ y ā d h y a k ṣ a – the Superintendent of merchandise—the same as the Paṇyādhyakṣa of Kauṭilya, has dealings with women in the course of purchase and sale of various articles.² But he says that honest women also often earn a living for themselves by spinning: "Those women who do not stir out of their houses (anīṣkāśinyah), those whose husbands are gone abroad, and those who are cripple or girls, may when obliged to work for subsistence, be provided with work (spinning out threads) in due courtesy through the medium of maid-servants (of the weaving establishment)." He therefore prescribes strict rules so that they may work with honour: "Those women who can present themselves at the weaving house shall at dawn be enabled to exchange their spinning for wages (bhāṇḍoreṭanarini-mayam). Only so much light as is enough to examine the threads shall be kept." Besides, he provides punishment if the Superintendent is tempted to look at the faces of such women or presumes to talk with them on any other topic except that of the business immediately in hand.³

A similar person is the N ā g a r a, the officer in charge of a city, that is, the Superintendent of the city police who in his rounds in the town at night meets wandering women going to meet their lovers and has power over them, in as much as he comes to be in possession of the secrets of their movements.⁴ In the villages also the government officer, Â y u k t a k a, in charge of a village, when he is a young man and the son of a leading husbandman himself, has easy access to the village-women who can be won over simply for the asking and who are called Carṣaṇīs.¹ With them he gets into contact on various accounts such as in works which they have to render without wages (viṣṭi), in storing and taking out things from the store-house, in cleaning the house, in work on the fields, in receiving cotton and wool and the fibrous skin of flax and hemp in accepting yarn spun by them, and in sale, purchase and exchange of various articles.²

The A ś v ā d h y a k ṣ a or the Master of the horse is also referred to in another connection.³ Two female officers, the K a ṇ c u k ī y ā, the female overseer of the women's apartments and the M a h a t t a r i k ā are mentioned by Vâtsyayana as employed in the harems of kings.⁴ They are employed by the queens in sending messages accompanied by various presents to the king.⁵ In the dramas we generally find male officers of advanced years employed as the Kaṇcukin or Chamberlain, but here a woman is found to be so appointed.

We may add here a few words with regard to the institution of Āśrama which, as we have already seen, Vātsyāyana speaks of as forming beside Varna, the other great foundation of Indian society'. He makes it clearer in his introductory chapter on the realisation of the threefold goal of human life (Trivarga). Thus he says, "Man, whose term of life, is a hundred years, should divide the whole of this period and practise the trivarga, that is Dharma, Artha and Kāma, in such a manner that they may harmonize together and not clash in any way." ² He explicitly lays down also directions for making this division. Thus he advises that in the first part of life (Bālya) which appears to include both boyhood and adolescence, one should devote oneself to such objects as the acquisition of learning, and in youth—Yauvana—to enjoyment (Kāma). In old age one should practise Dharma and further, seek the realisation of the ultimate goal of man's life viz. Mokṣa or the final emancipation from the bonds of life and death ; but, he goes on, as life is uncertain, these objects should be pursued just as they come to hand. However, he enjoins strictly that until a man finishes his education, he should practise brahmacarya, or lead a life of perfect chastity,³ that is, as both Manu and Yājñavalkya affirm, so long as he is a student, he must not swerve from the vow of chastity (avipluta-brahmacarya).⁴ This is the Brahmacaryāśrama or the first stage of life of the Dharmaśāstras. The Brahmacārin is also referred to in the Vaiśika section of the Kāmasūtra.⁵

Of the second stage of life, Vātsyāyana says that after getting one's education one should enter into the life of the householder (G ā r h a s t h y a), that is, one should marry and settle down as a *Nāgaraka*¹. As the Kamasūtra occupies itself entirely with this period when one enjoys life, Vātsyāyana has very little occasion to speak of the third and fourth āśramas of the Vānaprastha and the Yati respectively. But he speaks of the Lingins—that is, ascetics who wore the special marks and garments of their respective sects.² Female ascetics find more prominent mention as Pravrajitā, Sramaṇā, Kṣapaṇikā, Tāpasī, Bhikṣukī, Mundā etc.³ Of these, as we shall show hereafter, the Sramaṇā appears to be the Buddhist nun and the Kṣapaṇikā, the Jain Sādhvī, while the Tāpasī seems to belong to the Brahmanical faith. The name Pravrajitā appears to be applied to female ascetics in general. The Pravrajitā sometimes earned a living, as we have seen, by spinning.⁴ In the case of the *Bhikṣukā*⁵ and the Bhikṣukī it is difficult to decide whether these are Sanscritized forms of the Buddhist Bhikṣu and Bhikṣuṇī, or mean religious mendicants in general. In the inscriptions of the Sātavāhanas who were not very much anterior to Vātsyāyana, as well as of the contemporary epigraphic records of the Kṣaharātas, we find permanent endowments being made sometimes in favour of Buddhist Bhikṣus and sometimes again, in favour of Bhikṣus of all denominations. For example, Vāsiṣṭhiputra Śrī-Pulumāvi records a grant⁶ to

Buddhist Bhikṣus of the Bhadāyāniya sect, while Usavadāta, the son-in-law of the Kṣaharāta ruler, Naha-pāṇa, records in a rock-cave at Nāsik that he had made a gift of some land for the Bhikṣus coming from all quarters, that is, as Senart translates, "From it food will be procured for all monks, without distinction, dwelling in my cave."¹

All these ascetics, male and female, belong to the fourth stage of life, inasmuch as they had avowedly renounced the world, though some, as we see from what Vātsyāyana says of them, might have been persons of questionable morals. But we must remember that Vātsyāyana has occasion to speak of them only as persons who were likely to be of help (sahāya) to Nāgarakas and their mistresses and besides, to courtesans, in carrying their messages of love, as they had easy access to houses of citizens, and even to the antahpura or the inner apartments of the ladies.² It is, besides, a dilemma for a courtesan to solve whether it would be right conduct (dharma) for her, or the reverse, to reciprocate the feelings of an avowed ascetic like a Brahmacārin or a Līṅgin, when it becomes apparent that love unrequited would bring about his death :³ one way she would be guilty of abetting a breach of the vow of chastity, and the other way, she would make herself responsible for the death of a holy man, as the Commentary explains.

To the Vānaprastha we have absolutely no reference at all, as the recluse in the forest was beyond the scope of the Kāmasāstra even as a helper in the course of love. Moreover, it seems that this Brahmanical institution of the third Āśrama was going out of vogue. The Vaikhānasa Dharmapraśna tells us, that it was Brāhmaṇas alone who passed through all the four stages, the Kṣatriyas went through only three, and the Vaisyas two—the stages of the student and the householder¹. The Śūdra, apparently, was a householder throughout. The Great Epic shows the Kuru elders as passing to the forest life, but none of them emerged out of it into the life of the Yati or the Parivrajaka which was reserved for the Brahmins alone. Due to the influence of Buddhism and Jainism and the innate religious tendency of the Indian mind, there were many ascetics in the country—the L i n g i n s of Vātsyāyana, but very few of them appear to have come through the regular course of four stages as prescribed in the Dharmaśāstras. It seems that the third āśrama, that of the Vānaprastha, was going out of vogue in Indian society by the time that Vātsyāyana wrote his book, though of ascetics of various denominations there was no dearth at any time.

CHAPTER IV

MARRIAGE AND COURTSHIP

With regard to marriage, Vatsyayana is in general agreement with the Dharmasāstras, both with reference to the ideals as well as the procedure to be followed in the preliminary pourparlers leading to a settlement between the parties and also the ceremonies with which the hymeneal knot was finally tied. We have already seen how he quotes Āpastamba with regard to the selection of a bride¹. The influence of Manu upon him must have been immense, in as much as we find that according to Vātsyāyana it was Manu that separated the Dharma portion from the all-embracing cyclopædia of Prajāpati.² Yājñavalkya, again, according to the generally accepted view of scholars, could not have been far removed from his time,³ and an agreement between the two may naturally be expected. In addition to the Dharmasastra rules, however, Vātsyāyana often looks at matters from the common sense point of view and delineates the actual state of things in his time.

In the society depicted by Vātsyāyana, no marriage could take place, as we have already seen, until a young man had completed his education¹, until he had passed through to the end of the Vedic lore, as Yajñavalkya asserts². Again, in his chapter on marriage, Vātsyāyana emphasises the point that it was an educated man (ś r u t a v ā n) who was to look for a bride³. "It is only the educated man who is entitled to the householder's life," declares Medhātithi while expounding the corresponding passage of Manu and moreover, he affirms in the same connection, "Mere study of the Veda is not enough, its meaning also must have been mastered⁴." Even Siddhārtha, the Śākya prince was refused the hand of Gopā by her father, Daṇḍapāṇi the Śākya, who according to the L a l i t a v i s t a r a, thus made reply to the proposal for marriage offered by Suddhodana: "His Highness the Prince has been nurtured amidst ease and comfort, while it is our family-custom that a girl is to be given away to one proficient in the arts and not to one ignorant of them. The Prince is neither skilled in the arts nor is he acquainted with the art of warfare with the sword and the bow. How then could I bestow my daughter upon one ignorant in the arts."⁵ The Prince, the same book informs us, had to exhibit his learning and prowess, his proficiency in the arts and sciences, before he could get the hand of the girl of his choice. When we bear in mind that the Lalitaristara was written about the same time as the *Kāmasūtra*¹, the above episode in the life of Buddha gives us an insight into the mentality of the people of the period with regard to the necessity of a liberal and technical education before marriage.

The object of marriage, according to Indian ideals, was the obtainment of a son who would be competent to offer gifts and oblations after one is gathered to one's forefathers. * Vātsyāyana

although mainly concerned with the physical side of marriage, relating to the pleasures and amenities of married life, yet is not unmindful of the other ideals of worldly gain, social position and the spiritual welfare of the couple. To him a good marriage secures the ends of Dharma and Artha,—that is, both spiritual as well as social and economic welfare and besides, progeny, increase of relatives and friends and also untarnished, genuine love. With this we may compare the five things that determine marriage according to the Mānava Grhyasūtra, viz. wealth, personal charms, learning, wisdom and friends* The objects of marriage says Vātsyāyana, can best be secured by a man by his acquisition, according to the laws sanctioned by the holy writ (śāstra), of a virgin who belongs to the same caste and who has been won in accordance with the prescriptions of the sacred laws, then it provides the means of getting lawful progeny, secures a good name in the world and besides, obtains the approval of the public. The contrary practice, he goes on, of Kāma or love directed towards women of the higher castes, or towards those that have been married to others, even though belonging to the same caste, is prohibited.¹ Love only, and not marriage, may be offered to a woman of a higher caste, when she is a grāivī, that is, of unrestrained movements—a woman who has had many lovers before,² and in such a case, Vātsyāyana assures us, there will be no violation of Dharma or Law. Love with women of a caste lower than one's own, but even then not excommunicated from their own castes, with public women or with the Punar-bhūṣ, that is, widows who, unable to lead a life of continence and restraint, sought for a lover, was neither approved of as decent conduct (śiṣṭa), nor was it prohibited, as the object in these cases was pleasure only.³ In this last case, Vātsyāyana means to say that while such practice was not favoured by the better section of the community, it was not absolutely condemned by the public as the object of such union was simply pleasure and the woman was not expected to partake with him, like the lawful wife (pāṭnī), in the ceremonial rites, nor was she expected to give birth to lawful progeny as the Commentary explains . This is an important point to bear in mind as it serves to explain the mentality of the Indian law-givers. Offerings made by the progeny begot on such women would not be acceptable to the gods or the manes, therefore to take them to wife for having sons from them was unthinkable. Manu, though permitting anuloma marriage with a woman of a lower caste, including the Śūdra, proceeds, in the very same breath, most emphatically to condemn such marriage with a Śūdra woman and quotes a number of ancient authorities of whom even the most liberal would not permit a person of the twice born castes to have a son on a Śūdra woman. Thus says Manu, "According to Atri and to (Gautama) the son of Utathya, he who weds a Śūdra woman, becomes an outcast, according to Saunaka, on the birth of a son and according to Bhṛgu, he who has (male) offspring from a (Śūdra female, alone). A Brāhmaṇa who takes a Śūdra wife to his bed, will (after death) sink into hell ; if he begets a child by her, he will lose the rank of a Brāhmaṇa. The manes and the gods will not eat the (offerings) of that man who performs the rites in honour of the gods, of the manes, and of guests chiefly with a (Śūdra wife's) assistance and such (a man) will not go to heaven."² Yājñavalkya condemns such marriage categorically : "What is said about the acquisition of a wife from the Śūdra caste, does not commend itself to me, for the reason that one's own self is born in her.”¹ At the present day, inter-marriage between castes is not permitted by Hindu India under any circumstances, whether with superior or inferior castes, and we already notice a Growing unpopularity of Inter-caste Marriage in Hindu India

stiffness growing towards the question during the few centuries that intervened between Manu and Vātsyāyana. While Manu permits anuloma marriage, and that even with a Sūdra girl, though under protest, Yājñavalkya would exclude the Sūdra absolutely from its scope Vātsyāyana who gives a nearer view of the actual condition of society, would not countenance anything but marriage inside one's own caste, all connection with a woman of an inferior caste (avaravarṇā) is placed by him in the same category as love with public women, and he would not consider it as serious marriage at all.

After laying down this first requisite about marriage connected with Dharma, Vātsyāyana next proceeds to speak of the purely secular circumstances about which a person thinking about marriage should be satisfied. He says that to obtain the full benefits of a marriage, one should seek for mate a girl satisfying the following conditions. She should have both her parents alive, she must be younger than himself by three years or more ; she should come of a family of decent and approved conduct, possessed of wealth and rich in adherents, a family, the members of which are numerous and attached to one another, her relatives both on the father's side as well as on the mother's, should be large in number ; and for herself, she must be a girl possessed of physical charms, of excellent conduct, with lucky marks on her body : she should have neither more nor less than the proper number of teeth, nails, ears, hair, eyes and breasts, nor should any of these limbs have been lost by her ; she should be of a sound and healthy constitution ; the young man should, of course, be possessed of all these qualities himself and must have completed his studies.¹ Vātsyāyana perhaps feeling that a girl possessed of all these qualities would be rare indeed, quotes in

V. advises—
 * Marry the girl

 you happy'

the very next sūtra the opinion of an earlier writer on the subject, Ghotakamukha, who simplifies the whole thing by advising that a man should fix his affections on a girl when he would feel himself fortunate and happy in having her and at the same time would not incur the censure of his equals².

It is not to be understood, however, that Vātsyāyana advises a young man to seek for a bride of a social rank higher than his own : on the other hand, he specially sounds a distinct note of warning against all unequal unions, showing his intimate knowledge of the world.

Here he quotes certain verses :—“Social games, such as, for example, filling up ‘bouts rimes,’ marriages, and intercourse generally, should be with a man’s equals, not with those either above or below him. A man marries above him when he marries a girl only to be treated by her and her friends as a servant ever afterwards : no man of spirit will do that. He marries below him when he and his people load it over the girl, that is a bad marriage ; it too is censured by the good. When the love between husband and wife adds lustre to both, and is a source of joy to both families, that is the only marriage which is approved. Let a man, if he will, marry above him, and walk humbly among his wife's relations ever afterwards ; but on no account let him do what all good men disapprove of, marry beneath him."¹

With regard to the qualities of a desirable bride, Vātsyāyana again specifies certain physical and other defects which would render a girl unfit for selection. Here, as we have shown before, Vātsyāyana quotes from the Gṛhyasūtra of Āpastamba : thus he

of Defects and Disqualifications
of a Bride

prescribes—"Let him give up a girl who, when the wooers come to woo, is found asleep, in tears, or out. Let him shun also these sixteen—1 a girl with an unlucky name ; 2, one who has been kept in concealment ; 3, one who is betrothed to another man ; 4, one with red hair ; 5, one with spots ; 6, a masculine woman ; 7, one with a big head ; 8, a bandy-legged woman ; 9, one with a broad forehead ; 10, one ceremonially impure ; 11, the fruit of an improper marriage ; 12, one who has menstruated ; 13, one who is or has been pregnant ; 14, an old friend ; 15, one who has a younger sister much handsomer than herself ; and 16, one that hath a moist hand".²

Many of the terms in which these short-comings are worded are technical expressions the meanings of which are doubtful, we having to depend upon the explanation offered by the commentators. The above translation is based upon the commentary to the Kāma- sūtra, whereas the commentators of Apastamba such as Haradatta and Sudarśanārya, interpret some of the words in a different way. As the terms, however, are not of any great importance, we need not be detained by them.

Vātsyāyana also quotes another rule about the name of the girl—"A girl bearing the name of a constellation, a river, or of a tree is objectionable and besides a girl, the last letter but one of whose name is l or r, is to be avoided in wooing." ¹ A woman who is too white or too dark in complexion, should be avoided even as a mistress and pari passu as a wife, and similar prohibition holds in the case of a woman afflicted with leprosy, insanity etc., ² It may be observed here that in spite of the insistence of law-givers and Vātsyāyana's support of them, the defects about names have never been considered in India as a serious disability, and they appear to have been more obeyed in their breach than in their observance. Thus in ancient times as at the present day, some of the most popular names are names, of constellations like Rohiṇī and Citrā, of rivers like Gaṅgā and Yamunā, or names with penultimate 'l' or 'r' like Apālā and Visvavārā—authoresses of Rgvedic hymns³, and Kamalā and Tārā of later days.

Conscious that some of the many defects enumerated above are unavoidable and others are of a too technical character, Vātsyāyana, as in a previous case, when he quoted Ghoṭakamukha, quotes a simpler and more liberal rule from an ancient authority, in this case the Grhyasutra of Apastamba,

“He will be a happy husband who marries the woman on whom his heart and his eye are set. Let a man not think of any other. So some say.”¹ Here Vātsyāyana approves of a selection made not according to minute and detailed technical rules, but on the general impression produced by the whole appearance. As in the everyday world, people were likely to be guided by this impression at first sight. Hence Vatsyayana advises the parents and relatives of a girl when she has reached the marriageable age, to array her in a smart dress, and thus dressed she should sport every afternoon with her girl friends; at festivities like sacrifices, marriage celebrations, and, in fact, wherever there is a concourse of people, care should be taken to show her to advantage in society, for the reason, Vātsyāyana asserts, that such a girl is of the nature of an article of trade.²

With regard to the comparative age of the couple to be married, Vātsyāyana prescribes that the bride should be younger by three years or more³.

Bridegroom. In another passage which Vātsyāyana quotes from the Grhyasūtra of Apastamba, an expression (s v a n u j ā) is taken by the Commentator to mean “considerably less in age” and in support of his statement, he quotes a text, most probably from a Dharma- sūtra, which lays down that one should marry a girl who is in the fourth to the eighth year below him, that is, who is younger in age by three to seven years, neither more nor less. But the word scanujā is taken by others to mean a girl who has a fine younger sister¹. The Dharmaśāstras, however, contemplate a far greater disparity in years, the correct ratio prescribed being generally one to three. Thus we have in the Viṣṇu-Purāṇa: "One should marry a wife whose age is a third of one's own",² and the same rule is also laid down by the Mahābhārata—that a man of thirty years should marry a girl of ten³. Manu also prescribes the same thing, the relative proportion being either thirty and twelve or twenty-four and eight⁴. This seems to have been the ideal of the religious lawgivers, but Vātsyāyana seems to represent the actual state of things more closely. And it should be noticed that both Medhātithi and Kullūka in their comments on the passage of Manu quoted above, states that the rule about age was not absolute⁵ but only shows the approximate relation between the ages of the couple.

Though Vātsyāyana in the rule quoted from Apastamba prohibits the marriage of a rūkā or a *phalinī*¹, that is, a girl who has reached the age of puberty, yet many other passages in his book seem to show that he is speaking of virgins who have passed that age and were considerably advanced in youth; for example, he speaks of a wife just after marriage as Vigādha-yauvanī or advanced in youth² and many passages in his chapter on courtship presuppose a virgin who is of sufficient age to respond to offers of love. The rule of Āpastamba quoted by Vātsyāyana also appears to suggest that the bride has passed the age of puberty³—and again the rule held in common by Baudhāyana and Vātsyāyana that the gāndharva was the best form of marriage⁴, seems to indicate that both the parties had passed the age of puberty. It is impossible to conceive of Gāndharva marriage before the couple could feel mutual love.

Marriage of a girl before puberty, also appears to have been equally, if not more prevalent, as is evidenced by Vātsyāyana's section on Bālopakrama, that is, the courtship of a bālī or a girl of tender years. Similarly in a passage that we have already referred to above, he contrasts a wife who is of tender years, with one of advanced youth.⁵ This is also supported by the Grhyasūtras which speak of the marriage of a nagnikā, technically, a girl of ten years of age, as the most approved.¹

The truth seems to be that marriage took place of both tender girls before puberty as well as of those more advanced in years. In the earlier

Vedic times, including the R̥gvedic age, both these forms of marriage seem to have been in vogue. While on the one hand, there were virgins considerably advanced in years like Ghoṣā, there were others like Romaśā for example, who were evidently married before puberty. In a hymn addressed to the Asvins, the father of Ghoṣā, Kakṣīvat who is supposed to have been the author, says, "You bestowed, Asvins, a husband upon Ghoṣā growing old, and tarrying in her father's dwelling".² Ghoṣā in a hymn of her own also says addressing the Aśvins, "You Nasatyas, are the good fortune of a damsel growing old in (her father's) mansion"³ and the Bṛhaddevatā adds that "in the days of old she remained in her father's house for sixty years, when she in two hymns⁴ praised the Aśvins who gave her a husband."⁵ Romaśā was jeered at by her husband, the king Bhārayavya for her immaturity in years.⁶ The story of Uṣasti Cākrāyana who lived in a village with his child-wife when there was a great famine, is also well-known. Girls that were given away at the svayamvara must have reached youth. Sāvitrī is spoken of as Yauvanasthā at the time of marriage and Damayantī as Praptayauvanā. Yaśodharā is said to have been born on the same day as Prince Siddhārtha.*

Vātsyāyana sums up the whole thing in a verse in his section on courtship where he says that a maiden of tender years should be won over with the help of childlike sports and playthings, a damsel come of age by skill in the arts, and a spinster of more advanced years—vatsalā—with the help of persons in whom she confides.¹

of the bridegroom. We are told in a hymn of the Rgveda that when the god Soma was desirous of getting a bride, the two Aśvins became his varas or wooers, and presented the suit before savitṛ, the father of the bride,¹ and we are assured by another verse in the same hymn that when the Aśvins went in their three-wheeled car, soliciting the marriage of Sūryā, all the Gods signified their assent.² The Grhya-Sūtras also prescribe that Varas or woors are to be sent for selecting the girl.³

Vātsyāyana says, that for the selection of the girl, the father, mother and relatives of the young man should stir themselves and besides, mutual friends of the two parties should carry on messages between them.⁴ Vātsyāyana gives the advice that those charged with the varaṇa should exaggerate the defects present and prospective, of other suitors and should expatiate on the qualifications of their Nāyaka, both personal and hereditary, as well as such qualities as are likely to further their object; besides, they should enlarge upon such advantages possessed by him at the time, or likely to accrue to him in subsequent years, as would commend themselves to the girl's mother. The advantage of winning the favour of the girl's mother⁵ is emphasised upon and clever tricks also are recommended by Vātsyāyana for assuring success in the endeavour. Some of the friends of the youngman should drive the mother wild

by enumerating to her his chances of winning girls from other desirable parties.¹ One of the youngman's friends, again, may get himself up as an astrologer and give an account of the wealth and prosperity that would come to the Nāyaka in after years as promised by omens and portents, by the position of the planets and also by marks on his body.²

Vātsyāyana, though he speaks above of sham astrologers yet gives it as his decided opinion that a girl should be sought for, and also given away, when signs and omens, and portents and voices (upaśruti), are favourable³, and to support himself, he also quotes the earlier authority of Ghoṭakamukha, who says that marriages should not be contracted on human choice alone⁴, that is, daiva or superhuman tests should be applied by both the parties, in order to be satisfied that happiness and prosperity would result from the match. We must remember that the age of Vatsyayana was the age of the growth and development of Indian astronomy which was hardly ever dissociated from astrology, when as a result of this alliance between science and pseudo-science grew up that large body of Siddhanta works culminating in the great books of Varahamihira—the Pañcasiddhantika, the Brhatsamhita, and the Brhajjātaka.⁵ Though faith in extra-human tests in marriage had been in favour since the time of the Grhyasūtras as the Mānava Grhyasūtra, the Kausikasūtra and the others testify,¹ yet they seem to have been more popular than ever before in the age of Vātsyayana who presses into service even uparutis—supernatural oracular voices heard as a result of mystic invocations of Gods or sometimes miraculous utterances heard specially at night, as the Commentary explains²

The signs observed at the time of varaṇa, that is, when the bridegroom's party went to the parents of the girl to formally present their suit, were considered as very important factors in the final choice and hence Vātsyāyana quotes from Apastamba the rule that at the time of varaṇa, a girl who is found sleeping or weeping or has gone out of the house should be given up,³ these being considered as inauspicious portents; then follow rules about the name borne by the girl and similar other things that we have already referred to before⁴. However, many of these defects are insignificant, artificial or accidental and Vātsyayana was too astute an observer of the world to be led merely by such meaningless portents, and he at last quotes a simple rule, as we have seen before,⁵ from the same legal authority, that happiness and prosperity attend the choice of a girl in whom the heart and the eyes are pleased and none other should be favoured. To capture the heart and the eyes of the wooers therefore, Vātsyayana prescribes that the parents and relatives of a marriageable girl would be best advised to show her off in beautiful dress and ornaments and that thus got up, she should sport with her playmates every afternoon, and attend all festive gatherings¹.

He next proceeds to give an account of the way in which the girl's parents and relatives are to receive the Reception of the Suitors suitors. He thus goes on : "When men fair to look on, courteous in speech, and accompanied by their connexions, come to propose marriage, the parent of the girl should receive them hospitably, and on some pretext or other show the girl in all her ornaments. They should come to no decision as to giving the girl before they have consulted the oracles. The wooer's party will be asked to bathe and take their meal and so forth. They should say, 'All that will come later.' They should not that day accept such attentions".² The varana is to fructify, says Vātsyayana, in one of the four approved forms of marriage, viz, Brahma, Prajapatya, Arsha or Daiva, or according to the forms in vogue in one's own country.³

It would be seen that this ceremony of varana is not exactly courtship as Peterson takes it to be, because, here Varana is not Courtship the actual parties to the marriage have very little to do. They have no choice to exercise, the whole matter is settled by the parents and relatives, including the selection of the bride. Personal courtship by the young people themselves has a secondary importance only with Vātsyāyana ; it was to be resorted to when other means failed. Hence he does not describe courtship first and marriage afterwards, but he first of all deals with the acquisition of a wife in the method approved of by society and by ancient tradition as contained in the sacred literature, and when this fails, a man may try to win over a girl by honest courtship, and even that failing, he may use tricks and even violence to secure his end. A girl also, under certain circumstances, though rather rare, may according to Vātsyāyana, take up the task of getting her husband in her own hands as we shall presently see.

A young man is to give up the idea of preferring his suit (raraṇa) in the approved method and think of winning the affections of a girl by his own personal exertions when he finds himself placed under certain unfavourable circumstances: thus, he may be poor though otherwise fully qualified as a suitor; or when possessed of mediocre qualifications (madhyastha-guṇa), he may be of rather mean birth; or though rich, he may be a neighbour and therefore would not be liked on account of his high pretensions, or he may be disliked because of the possibility of quarrels springing up over boundaries etc., as the Commentary observes;¹ or though possessing parents and brothers, he may be dependent on others; or he may be considered a mere boy;—in all such cases when he cannot hope for a favourable response to his suit, he should try to gain the love and esteem of the girl on whom his heart is set from her childhood.²

Vātsyāyana gives an example here from the people of the south : thus, for example, says he, in the Dakṣiṇāpāṭha, one separated from one's mother when a child, and living in a subordinate position in the family of his maternal uncle, should try to gain over the daughter of the uncle when beyond his reach on account of her wealth, even if she may have been provisionally betrothed to another.¹ He may attempt to win over other girls also from childhood, for Ghoṭakamukha, who is Vātsyāyana's great authority for all matters appertaining to nuptials, declares that this courtship from childhood is unexceptionable as union is brought about by honest and honourable means (dharma).² Here Vātsyāyana confirms what Baudhāyana says about the irregular practice of the people of the south, that they marry the daughter of a maternal uncle.³ Kumārila Bhaṭṭa also casts a fling at the Dākṣiṇātya who, he says, is overjoyed to get the daughter of his maternal uncle.⁴ "The marriages between cousins," as Bühler points out, "occur among the Karhāḍa Brāhmaṇas of the Dekhan."⁵ The existence of this custom in high circles in the South, receives historical confirmation from the inscriptions of the powerful royal house of the Rāṣṭrakūṭa sovereigns of Malkhed. Thus the Rāṣṭrakūṭa monarch Kṛṣṇa II, who reigned during the last part of the ninth Vātsyayana gives detailed instructions about the methods of courtship, varying according to age. A mere

Courtship of a Girl of tender years girl (bālā) is to be wooed by sharing in her child like sports and occupations, a damsel who is come of age (yauvanasthitā), by an exhibition of skill in the arts or kalās, and a woman more advanced in years is to be courted through the help of those in whom she places her confidence.² Thus the young swain is advised to collect flowers and make garlands in company with the maiden whose heart he wishes to win and to carry on with her games befitting their age or the degree of familiarity between them, or only such as are agreeable to her disposition.³ He should form the acquaintance of and propitiate her female friends, specially the daughter of her nurse, by little acts of kindness and service—as she would be very helpful in his quest.⁴ The man should get for the girl things that she takes a fancy to.⁵ Vātsyāyana then gives a fairly long list of presents that would be prized by her especially such as would show her off on days of public and private festivities.¹ When he has won the confidence to some extent then he may amuse her by relating agreeable stories or entertain her with music². He himself must always be faultlessly dressed and never be offensive to sight, because, Vātsyāyana argues, when maidens reach youth they get to love men whom they frequently see³. He should now carefully take note of her movements and see if he can detect any signs of growing partiality for him.⁴

Vātsyayana here enumerates the outward signs and actions by which a budding affection may be discovered, such as, she cannot look the man in the face, casts side-long glances at him and so on, all of which are quite true to nature.⁵ When the outward signs and movements leave no doubt about her love, he should grow less timid gradually, take greater and greater liberties with her without giving any offence⁶ and try to gain her over entirely by means of various tricks and devices that recommend themselves to young lovers in every clime. Vātsyayana takes pains to describe them at some length and at last he again quotes Ghoṭakamukha to warn the young swain that he must be quick to read the signs that betray her passion, because even when love is far advanced success cannot be achieved with maidens by sloth and despondence and he can never expect a damsel to confess her love.¹

Placed in unfavourable circumstances similar to those from which a young man suffers, a maiden may also have to look for a husband herself and Vātsyāna takes her case also in hand. When a girl though possessed of excellent qualities is born in a humble family, or even when well-born, is destitute of wealth and is therefore not sought after by her equals, or has been deprived of her parents and is dependent upon her relatives and if she has come of age (prapta-yauvanā), then she should stir herself to arrange her marriage herself.² Here we are reminded of the rule advocated by Manu himself and supported by other sacred books including the Mahābharata, that a damsel should wait three years after reaching puberty, and after that period she may choose for herself a husband befitting her.³ Such a maiden should try to gain over a young man of ability possessed of virtues, and of a handsome look, whose affections she had shared in childhood ; or, when she feels assured that a man owing to his passion for her would not hesitate to unite with her even against the consent of his parents, then she may win him over by endearing herself to him and by meeting him often.¹ She may show her skill in the arts, and various other devices² are recommended by Vātsyāyana, who, however, warns a girl against presenting her suit to a man herself, even when she is deeply in love with him, because such conduct brings ruin unto a damsel, so declare the teachers (cāryas) of the Kāmasāstra.³ In another connection also he forbids a man to have anything to do with a woman who herself makes overtures of love openly⁴. Vātsyāyana also tries to press upon a girl the sage advice that in choosing a husband, she should look for love and not money; "It is better," says he, "to love a husband who is devoted to her though poor, than a rich man, or one endowed with many virtues, when his affections she would have to share with others⁵." When there are several eligible suitors of equal quality, the real suitor is he with whom there is a mutual reciprocation of love⁶.

Vātsyāyana next proceeds to describe the forms of marriage that would cement the union brought about by courtship between the parties themselves, without the permission of the parents or relatives, and the details furnished by Vātsyāyana are interesting as illustrating the definitions given in the Grhyasūtras and the Dharmasūtras. perfect unity of sentiment is established between the parties and all the scruples of the maiden overruled by persuasions, the time and place of meeting should be arranged with the help of friends. When the girl has been brought to a secret place, sacred fire should be brought from the house of a Srotriya Brahmin who maintains a perpetual fire for the performance of his daily sacrificial rites, kuśa grass should be spread before it upon the earth, oblations offered in the fire in accordance with the prescriptions of the sacred law (smṛti), and then they should thrice go round the fire, and after this is completed, the parents of the girl should be informed¹; "A marriage performed before fire as witness to the transaction, can never be set aside, this is the rule approved by all teachers" (acarya-samaya), says Vātsyayana². By and by the relatives on both sides should be informed and be persuaded to confirm the marriage by bestowing the girl upon her lover in the formal way, by representing to them that otherwise the king might punish the bridegroom's side for the violence, and on the other side, the fair name of the girl's family may be tarnished, and then both sides may be reconciled by an exchange of presents. This is the Gandharva form of marriage³.

Vātsyayana considers several other cases also : if the girl cannot make up her mind, then the man should, with the help of another lady of good family have the maiden brought to a secret place on some pretext, and have the rites performed as before'. When the marriage of the girl has been settled with some other person and the date of the nuptial ceremony draws near, then he should by all means turn her mother against the match, by having recounted to her the faults and defects of the prospective bridegroom, and with her consent have the girl brought to a neighbour's house and get the nuptials celebrated ; or he may place the brother of the girl under great obligation to himself, and with his help get the girl brought to a secret place and married to him as described above'. All these are supposed to represent the G ā n d h a r v a form of marriage.

Then Vatsyayana gives two illustrations of the P a i ś ā c a form. At public festivities the man may make the daughter of her nurse administer to the girl some intoxicating substance and then have her brought to a secret place when she is senseless under the drug. Afterwards he would inform her relatives of it and persuade them to bestow her on him, or he may do the like when she is asleep'.

Last of all he describes the R ā k ṣ a s a form. Coming to know beforehand that the girl would be going on a journey to another village, or to the gardens, the man may lie in ambush with a sufficient number of friends, then frighten away or kill her guards and forcibly carry her off'.

In all these marriages celebrated without the consent of the parents, Vātsyāyana advises, as we have seen, that particular care should be taken to have some nuptial ceremonies performed in sacred fire, so that they may not run the risk of being cancelled. This is to provide against the contingency of the girl's parents overlooking the secret union and bestowing her upon another man, such as is authorised by Baudhāyana and Vasiṣṭha, both of whom prescribe that if a girl has been abducted by force, but the due nuptial rites have not been performed with the recitation of the sacred texts (mantras), then she may be lawfully given away with the proper rites, to another person, she is as good as a virgin¹. Even when the parents agree, it will be necessary to have the marriage ratified, by a formal performance of the rites. Devala declares that in the forms of marriage beginning with the Gāndharva, that is, in the Gāndharva, Paiśāca and Rākṣasa forms, the rites should again be performed by the three higher castes in the regular method, before the fire as witness². There is a difference of opinion among law-givers as to whether this second performance of the nuptial rites is in order, Manu declaring against it, as in such cases the girls are no longer virgins³.

Vātsyāyana has mentioned before⁴ four forms of marriage, approved in genteel society, in the order Brāhma, Prājāpatya, Ārṣa and Daiva, but he has not delineated their distinctive characteristics, taking it for granted perhaps that their connotations were all known to his readers, and he might very well do so, inasmuch as they were exhaustively dealt with in the Gr̥hyasūtras, the Dharmasāstras, the Great Epic and the Purāṇas and similar other literature. Now he describes the Gāṇḍhārva, Paisāca and Rākṣasa forms; of these, the first he mentions by name, and of the last two forms, he only gives the description and leaves the names to be supplied by the reader. However, thus we see that he mentions altogether seven forms, leaving out the Āsura marriage in which "the bridegroom receives a maiden, after having given as much wealth as he can afford, to the kinsmen and the bride herself, according to his own will". It is rather striking that Vātsyāyana does not advise a young man to purchase his bride by money, though he does not shrink from recommending the adoption of meaner and more violent forms like the Paisāca and the Rākṣasa. Most probably, it was very much looked down upon in cultured society in his days. Yājñavalkya², however, mentions the Asura marriage along with the other seven. Now, applying Vātsyāyana's dictum that in his list of the seven forms, one that precedes is superior to one that follows, on account of its being more in accordance with dharma or the sacred law³, we arrive at a graded series which is not quite in agreement with the Dharmasāstras. For instance, Manu gives the series thus—Brāhma, Daiva, Prājāpatya, *Ārṣa*⁴. The other three he has not graded, but taking them in the order in which he enumerates them, they are to be graded as Asura, Gāndharva, Rākṣasa and Paisāca the last of which he definitely characterises as the eighth and the worst¹. Yājñavalkya also agrees with Manu with only the slight difference that he places the Ārṣa and the Prājāpatya in the same category². Kautilya also mentions all the eight forms of marriage but what is remarkable, is that he, unlike Manu and others, enumerates the first four forms in exactly the same order as Vātsyāyana,³ showing here a point of agreement with the latter, as in many other respects. Most of the authors of the law codes differ from Vātsyāyana in condemning the Paisāca as the worst, worse than even the Rākṣasa, but the Commentator of Vātsyāyana explains the position of his author by saying that the Paisāca, though not lawful (adharmya), yet is better than the Rākṣasa, as the latter involves violence⁴.

Summing up the views of Vātsyāyana, it appears that he sanctions a great deal of freedom from ordinary rules and conventions with regard to marriage. We have seen that in the matter of the selection of a bride, he is ready to cast off to the wind all the innumerable checks and tests that hamper the free exercise of choice, non-essential, technical imperfections being never allowed to stand in the way when there is a union of hearts, not even when the consent of the parents is not available on either side. According to him, therefore, the Gāndharva form of marriage is the most respected (pūjita), because, he declares, love is the fruit of all the forms of marriage that can be conceived of, and love is more in evidence here than in any other forms where considerations of birth, money or other qualities are the deciding factors. It brings forth happiness, is not accompanied by all the troubles of a lengthy negotiation and ceremonial, and what is more important, is the result of mutual love¹.

CHAPTER V

LIFE OF THE NAGĀRAKA

Vātsyāyana in his work holds up the ideal of city-life. He wrote the Kāmasūtra as a practical handbook for the guidance of city-bred men of fashion—the Nāgarakas. A whole section of his book is called Nāgaraka-vṛttam, wherein he describes the life of a city-man, not of a mere dweller in a city—such a person would only be a nāgara,—but of a nāgaraka, who, according to Paṇini, is a city-bred man skilled in the arts and knaveries that specially develop in a big city, one possessing the virtues and vices of “a cockney”; he might be a clever artist or a knave, as the Kāśikā-vṛtti so naively explains.¹ Vātsyāyana’s book is calculated to benefit such men and women, among them princesses and daughters of high officials (Mahāmātras), who armed with an expert knowledge of the practical directions given by him, would be able to subdue the heart of a husband whose love is shared by a crowded harem of as many as a “thousand” wives.² Vātsyāyana recommends the city as the proper place of abode for a person who after finishing his education, thinks of entering the world, the gṛhasthāśrama, with the wealth that he may have acquired, either by inheritance or by the pursuit of the profession particularly appertaining to his own caste and his position in society; 'such a man should adopt the life of a nāgaraka and fix his habitation in a city—whether small or big, a nagara, or a pattana, or a kharvaṭa, or at least in a resort of many good and noble persons.' In the age of Vātsyāyana, apparently everybody who was marked out from the rest by any pre-eminence in intelligence, or learning, or skill in the arts, was attracted to the city, and found his patron in the king, or in a wealthy nāgaraka, or found employment at the clubs and assemblies of citizens or under the guilds of merchants and artisans.

If a person could not afford to live in a city and was forced to shut himself up in a village by the exigencies of earning his livelihood, even then he should, according to Vātsyāyana, look upon civic life as the ideal and by giving to his fellow villagers glowing descriptions of the pleasant life led by the nāgaraka, he should inspire those among his own class who show any special cleverness or curiosity, with a desire to imitate the conduct of the city-people and he should give them a taste of the amenities of city-life by starting clubs and social gatherings as in the city, by himself gratifying his friends with his company, by favouring them with his assistance and by introducing the spirit of mutual help and co-operation.' A village-wife is spoken of as a simpleton and village-women generally are spoken of as very light and fickle; such rustic women (carṣanīs) are regarded with scant courtesy by Vātsyāyana.⁴ The life of a round of pleasures in the city was naturally very expensive and many ran through their fortunes. Such a nāgaraka who had eaten up his fortune (bhukta-vibhavaḥ) might, however, if clever, earn a living by placing himself at the service of the clubs and pleasure-houses where he would be respected on account of his skill in the arts, and then he would be called a viṭa.¹ Even if a man had no fortune of his own he might enjoy the pleasures of life as a pṛthamārda; he might acquire skill in the arts and go about as an itinerant professor of these at the clubs of citizens and the abodes of ganikās; such a man was marked by his peculiar seat (mallikā) which he hung on his back, by his dyed clothes and by some kind of soap (phenaka) which he always carried about in order to keep himself clean.² Or he might, if he was skilled in only a few of the arts, attach himself to a wealthy nāgaraka as his companion and confidential friend and then he was called a vidūṣaka or a vaihāsika, a professional jester.³

GROWTH OF CITIES IN ANCIENT INDIA

This strong desire for the gay life of the city shows that there must have been a pretty large number of cities at the time when Vātsyāyana's work was written. Cities had grown up in India from very ancient times. The village and its headman,—the grāma and the grāmaṇi—are no doubt often met with in the R̥gveda,¹ but the grāma sometimes grew into a mahāgrāma and people naturally crowded round the settlement of a powerful chieftain, round his pur or fortified habitation.² In later Vedic literature, cities were very well known; the Mānava Gr̥hyasūtra mentions the grāma, the nagara and the nigama.³ The cities were very well known to the compilers of the Dharmasūtras, Baudhāyana going so far as to warn people desirous of spiritual growth against residence in cities: he declares that it is hardly possible for a man who resides in a town—“whose body, whose face and eyes are defiled by the impure dust of a city”—to obtain success in his spiritual quest.⁴ Pāṇini in the seventh century B.C. knew many towns, as we see from his sūtras and some of his gaṇas; even the nagaraka, the special product of city-life as we have pointed out, was known to him. Kaṭilya and Megasthenes show that there were some very big cities with elaborate arrangements for civic government and that municipal organisation of the city had developed wonderfully.⁵ In the Jātakas and the Buddhist Pali texts we find the description of large and prosperous cities which were seats of government and where trade flourished, where the gaḥapati was a prominent citizen and the śreṣṭhi took a leading part.⁶ The Milinda Pañho gives a splendid description of the town of Sākala,¹ and nearer Vātsyāyana's time, we find beautiful descriptions of splendid and prosperous towns given in the Buddhacarita and Lalitavistara.² In Vātsyāyana's time all over India there must have been a large number of cities, great and small, for India was then broken up into innumerable principalities and each prince had his own fortified capital. Besides, cities had grown up at places of pilgrimage—Brahmanic, Buddhist and Jaina—or had sprung up as centres of the growing trade of the country. It was for the dwellers of these cities, where wealth accumulated and where the virtues and vices that wealth brings in its train specially developed, that Vātsyāyana wrote his great work.

ECONOMIC PROSPERITY OF INDIA IN THE AGE OF VĀTSYĀYANA

At the time that Vātsyāyana wrote, India was carrying on an abundant trade, by land and by sea, with China on the one hand and the Roman orient on the other. According to a Chinese book Funantu-sih-tchuan written in the third century A.C., Kuntien or Kaundinya founded an Indian Colony in Indo-China about B.C. 53, and it soon grew up into a great centre of foreign trade in that quarter. By way of this Brahmanic colony planted in Indo-China, the Indians carried on an ever-increasing maritime trade with China in the approved Chinese method of sending so-called embassies and making an exchange of presents. We read again and again in the Chinese annals of numerous Indian envoys who presented tribute by way of Jihnan (modern Annam and Tonquin).³ With Asia

Minor and the near West, India had been intimately connected for a long time as we see from Aśoka's inscriptions; and the settlement of the Kushans as a great Indian ruling power in the north-western marches of the country, led to the opening out of trade-routes to the east and the west, and it placed India in a position of vantage with regard to the trade with the civilised world, with the dominions of the "Son of Heaven" on the one hand and the empire of the Cæsars on the other. When in the second century A.C., not very long before Vātsyāyana, a great Kushan emperor adopted the magnificent title of Mahārāja-Rājātirāja-Devaputra-Kaisara Kaniska—"The great King, the King of Kings, the Son of Heaven, the Cæsar Kaniska", we see that in him there was a fusion of the three great civilisations of the time—the Indian, the Chinese and the Roman.¹ The currency of the Kushans shows an equally international character and seems to be designed to facilitate the trade of these dominions with the rest of the world; the coins show a strange and wonderful combination of Greek, Zoroastrian and Indian designs and icons; some of them have Jupiter on one side and Buddha on the other; they have legends in Greek, Iranian or Indian vernaculars and in varied scripts, Greek, Brāhmī or Kharoṣṭhī. There cannot be any doubt that these coins were intended for currency inside as well as outside and they afforded facility of exchange to the Indian merchants trading with the near West. Vātsyāyana also knew coins of copper, silver and gold. He speaks of a kāra paṇa of small value and of the niṣka or coin of gold; besides, he refers to the art of examining rūpyas or coins as one of the sixty-four kalās. Moreover, he uses the word hiranya to mean money in general including perhaps, gold and silver coins.¹

Pliny in the first century A.C. and Ptolemy in the second, testify to the great trade that India had with the Roman empire.² In the third century when Vātsyāyana lived, this trade must have gone on increasing and we shall not be far mistaken to conjecture that the Brahmanic colonies, that Fa Hien visited in Java, went out about this period. The prosperity that this extensive commerce with the civilised world conferred on India, is fully reflected in the life of the nāgaraka, everything about whom, house and furniture, dress and ornaments, sports and pastimes, charity and liberality, bespeak an unstinted expenditure of wealth.

The literature of the period to which Vātsyāyana belongs, amply corroborates the description that he gives of society. But we shall have room only to quote an occasional passage here and there from the works of Bhāsa and from the Lalitavistara both of which are supposed to belong to the third century A.C. and, therefore, to have been written about the same time as the Kāmasūtra; we may also draw some illustrations from the works of Asvaghōṣa who flourished about a century earlier and belongs virtually to the same epoch.³

THE HOUSE OF A NĀGARAKA

The house that the nāgaraka builds for his residence shows his taste and love of beauty and the simple but choice furniture and decorations that adorn his rooms show his love of art and his many-sided culture. As we have seen before, the nāgaraka builds his house in a city. It has to be in close proximity to a supply of water and is divided into two parts, the inner belonging to the ladies and the outer where, as we shall see presently, the master of the house attends to business and receives visitors. There is a number of rooms each set apart for its special purpose, and attached to the house there must be a vrkṣavāṭikā or a garden with wide grounds, if possible, where flowering plants and fruit-trees can grow as well as kitchen vegetables.¹ In the middle of the ground should be excavated either a well, or if there is room enough, a tank or a lake.² This garden is attached to the inner court and is looked after by the mistress of the house. It is the duty of a good housewife says Vātsyāyana, to procure the seeds of the common Indian kitchen vegetables and medicinal herbs and plant them each in its season.³ In neat and clean spots in the garden where the ground has been well dressed, the lady of the house plants beds of green vegetables,—clumps of the tall sugarcane, patches of stunted shrubs of the mustard and similar herbs, and thickets of the dark tamāla.⁴ The flower-garden equally receives her tender care ; she has to see that it is laid out with beds of plants that yield an abundance of flowers—those that regale the nose with their sweet perfume, like the mallikā, the veti or the naramālikā, as well as those that delight the eye like the japā with its crimson glory or the kuraṅṭaka (amaranth) with its unfading yellow splendour, and besides, there should be in this garden, rows of shrubs yielding fragrant leaves or roots, like bulaka and śāra. In the gardens there are arbors and sometimes vine-groves where she gets built sthanayas or raised platforms with pleasant and comfortable seats for rest or recreation.¹ Flowers should be spread on these seats in these sweet sylvan retreats and a swing be hung at a spot well guarded from the sun by its leafy arbor.² An abundance of various flowers should also be arranged with art here and there over the residential house which must be kept scrupulously clean, the floor should be beautifully smooth and polished so as to soothe the eyes ; besides attending to these duties, the lady of the house should also see that at her abode the morning, noon and evening rites—sacrifices and gifts—are duly observed and the gods worshipped at the sanctuaries of the household ; for she must realise, as an ancient teacher, Gonardīya, has observed, that nothing pleases and charms the heart of a householder so much as a well-kept, neat and tidy home where the gods are respected and the religious duties well observed.¹ The mistress of the house should also see that her kitchen is situated in a quiet and retired spot and is clean and attractive.² The proper keeping of the house was thus the particular care of the wife of the nāgaraka and the erection of a noble pile of buildings is, according to our author, among the most earnest desires of women.³

Large and magnificent houses harmyas and prāsādas, were known to Vātsyāyana; the nāgaraka sometimes might enjoy moonlight on the terrace of a palace and examine the stars and planets with his beloved.⁴ The walls of the houses were sometimes beautifully polished so as to reflect the image of a girl, and not infrequently the roof of the house stood on pillars, stambhas.⁵ The Buddhacarita mentions an iron pillar and the Saundarananda Kāvya speaks of a pillar of gold and also of a minor support or upastambha.⁶ The floor of a palace was sometimes decorated with mosaic work, being inlaid with coral or with precious stones. In the palace-gardens there were samudra-grhas or cool summer-houses surrounded by water, washed as it were, by the sea, and also rooms in the walls of which there were secret passages for water to circulate and take away the heat.¹ Bhāsa's Soapna-Vāsavadattam (Act V) has such a samudragrha, and in later dramas also it is not rare ; the Viṣṇu-Smṛti (V. 117) prescribes punishment for a samudragrha-bhedaka. Secret pleasure-houses standing amidst the waters of garden tanks are referred to by Kālidāsa.² Besides the garden, Vātsyāyana has not given much detailed description of the antahpura or the inner sanctum of the ladies. Bhāsa designates it as the inner court with apartments or houses on four sides (abhyntara-catuhśālā), which suggests the plan of construction of the inner apartments of an Indian house from very ancient times.³ This plan combined the advantages of seclusion and privacy together with provision for light and air.

Vātsyāyana describes with greater fulness the outer chambers which the master called particularly his own and where he spent by far the greater portion of his day and night. An examination of the furniture and equipments of these chambers will give us an insight into the life of the man of wealth and fashion in the third century after Christ. The articles that Vātsyāyana first draws attention to, in the master's apartment, are two couches with beds, soft and comfortable and spotlessly white, sinking in the middle, and having rests for the head and feet at the top and the bottom. At the head of his bed is a kūrca-sthāna, a stand or perhaps a niche for placing an image of the deity that he worships, as the commentary, Jayamaṅgalā explains ; besides, at the head there is also an elevated shelf serving the purposes of a table whereon are placed articles necessary for his toilet in the early dawn, namely, fragrant ointments such as sandal-paste, a garland of flowers, small pots containing bees' wax and sweet perfumes, the skin of the mātulūṅga or the citron fruit for perfuming the mouth and also betel-leaves prepared with spices and scents. On the floor is a vessel for catching the spittle (patadgraha). On the wall, on brackets (elephants' tusks—nāgadantaka) are ranged his vīṇā, the national instrument of music in ancient India, a casket containing brushes and other requisites for painting, a book—preferably a poetical work—and garlands of the yellow amarnath (kuraṇṭaka), chosen because it does not fade or wither soon and therefore is good for decorating the rooms. Not far from the couch, on the floor, is spread a carpet with cushions for the head, and besides, there are boards for playing at chess and dice. Outside the room is the nāgaraka's aviary where are hung cages of birds for game and sport ;¹ we read in the Buddhacarita that the birds in such household aviaries in the city of Kapilavastu were disturbed by the hurried movements of ladies hastening to catch a glimpse of the young prince Siddhārtha as he passed along the street.² At a somewhat retired spot in the house are places where our nāgaraka amuses himself by working at the lathe or the chisel.³

THE DAILY LIFE OF THE NĀGARAKA

Vātsyāyana has left us a description of the occupation of the nāgaraka during the whole of the day, which though brief, yet brings up very beautifully the man of fashion of those days before our eyes. Our nāgaraka gets up early in the morning and after attending to his morning duties and cleaning his mouth and teeth, proceeds to his toilet. The first article in this toilet is the anulepana, a fragrant ointment ordinarily made of fine sandal-wood paste, or of preparations of a variety of sweet-smelling substances.¹ He applies a suitable quantity of this ointment to his person; it would be considered bad taste if he used too much of this perfume; he then scents his clothes in the sweet-smelling smoke of incense (dhūpa) thrown into the fire and wears a garland on the head, or hangs it round his neck. He applies collyrium made of various substances to his eyes. To his lips, already reddened by the betel he has chewed, he applies alaktaka (a red dye made from lac), to impart a deeper crimson to them and then rubs them over with wax to make the dye fast. Then he looks at himself in a glass, chews spiced betel-leaves to perfume his mouth, and proceeds to attend to his business.² He attends to his hair and wears rings on his fingers that are sometimes of great value.³ He generally wears two garments, a vāsas or vastra and an uttariya or a wrap for the upper part of the body. This upper garment was sometimes very highly scented with rich perfumes or flowers.⁴ Bhāsa tells us that the rich fragrance of Cāru-datta's wearing apparel assured Vasantasenā that though impoverished, he was not quite unmindful of the amenities of youthful society.¹ At Nanda's house at Kapilavastu when Buddha entered it, some of the maids were preparing the perfumed paste while others were perfuming the clothes.² In the Lalita-vistara we read that King Śuddhodana ordered that all those who would attend on Māyādevī on her journey to the garden of Lumbinī, should wear clothes, soft and fine, coloured with pleasant dyes and smelling sweet with the best of the scents. Similarly, in another place in the same book, we read of a perfumed garment of the exquisite colour of the nāgakeśara.³

Sweet scents, we thus see, played a very important part in the toilet of the nāgaraka. He made an abundant use of flowers, he rubbed sweet-scented ointments over his body and besides, he used other perfumes—saugandhikas—and a box of scents, a saugandhika-putikā, was kept handy by every nāgaraka. He perfumes his mouth with betel-leaves prepared with sweet-scented spices. The fragrant smoke of incense was made to circulate through his rooms and impart a perfume to his clothes. The Lalita-vistara corroborates Vātsyāyana about the plentiful use of perfumes. Besides the scented ointment or anulepana, the Lalita-vistara mentions scented waters of various kinds, perfumed oils and fragrant powders of sandal, flowers or other sweet-smelling things.⁴ These objects—flowers, perfumes and betel-leaves formed the most ordinary gifts exchanged between friends and lovers.¹

After attending to his business in the morning, the nāgaraka takes his bath ; this he does every day but there are other attendant circumstances that are repeated at varying intervals. Every other day he gets his limbs massaged and shampooed (utsādana) ; every third day he cleanses his person with soap-like substances that yield a lather with water (phenaka). This last was considered an indispensable article for one who aspired to decent life in those days, as we see that even when a man became too poor to maintain himself as a nāgaraka and became a piṭhamarda, his phenaka or soap marked him out from ordinary men. As regards shaving, the nāgaraka was behind the modern man of fashion ; he got his chin and lips cleaned every fourth day and this was probably considered conducive to long life (āyusyam) and a more thorough tonsorial operation was performed every fifth or every tenth day. This completes the bath.² Though he was thus not so fastidious as our modern dandies as regards the hair on his face, he was certainly more careful about his finger nails. They were specially dressed, particularly those of the left hand ; the points of the nails should always be fine and sometimes they were cut into three or more teeth like a saw. The nails must be well-set, smooth, bright, scrupulously clean, not broken, and soft and glossy in appearance. The people of Gauda (modern Bengal) had very fine and long nails that imparted a grace to their hands and were very attractive to women, and the southerners (the Dākṣiṇātyāḥ) had small nails which were good for work but of which they made very great artistic use, and the people of Mahārāṣṭra were midway between the two. The use of the nails was a great art which the nāgaraka took great pains in acquiring ; with them, he skilfully and without causing pain, affixed on his beloved, marks that might be straight, curved, circular, semicircular like the crescent moon, or which might resemble the tiger's claw, the peacock's foot, the leap of a hare or the leaf of a blue lotus.¹ Similar care was taken of the teeth and artistic use made of them, because, Vātsyāyana says, no other art increases love so much as the clever use of the nails and teeth.² Besides attending to the daily ablution and the other things noted above, for keeping his person clean, the nāgaraka must always carry a handkerchief (karpaṭa) with himself for removing perspiration.³

He takes two meals a day, in the forenoon, and the afternoon, but according to Cārāyana, and earlier teacher, the last meal had better be taken in the evening.⁴ Three kinds of hard or soft food and drinks, bhakṣya, bhojya and peya corresponding to the khādaniya, bhojaniya and pāna of the Buddhist sacred books,⁵ have been mentioned by Vātsyāyana. Among his articles of diet we notice rice, wheat, barley, pulses, a large number of vegetables, milk and its preparations including ghee, meat and sweets, besides salt and oil. Among the sweets, we have molasses (guda) and sugar (śarkarā) as well as sweetmeats (khaṇḍa-khādyāni).⁶ Fish is nowhere mentioned by our author as an article of diet. Meat was eaten boiled as soup, and dry or roasted. To desist from eating meat, as prescribed in the law books, was considered to be an act of merit (dharma).⁷ The nāgaraka's drinks (pānakāni) were also various : besides water and milk, he drank fresh juice, perhaps of the various kinds of palm, extracts of meat, congey (or rice gruel), sherbets, juice of fruits such as mangoes and citrons mixed with sugar ; of stronger drinks, he used various wines like surā, madhu, maireya and āsava,—which he drank from a chaṣaka, a vessel of wood or metal, often accompanied by various kinds of sweets, and savouries of bitter and acrid taste in order to impart a relish to drink.¹

After the midday meal the nāgaraka enjoys his siesta, he diverts himself by pleasant talk with his friends, the pīṭhamarda, the viṭa or the vidūṣaka, listens to the talk of parrots, views fights between cocks, quails or rams, or is engaged in various kinds of artistic enjoyments. Besides the animals mentioned above, he also kept for his own amusement a number of cuckoos for their sweet melody and peacocks for their glorious plumage and also monkeys. At the king's palace, besides these animals of sport, lions and tigers were also kept in cages.²

In the afternoon, after he has dressed himself, the nāgaraka goes out to attend a goṣṭhī or a social gathering where he engages, as we shall see below, in pleasant intellectual diversions with his friends and in tests of skill in the various arts. At night-fall, our nāgaraka enjoys music, vocal and instrumental, occasionally attended with dances. After music, in his own room which has been made sweet and clean and gay with flowers, and while its fragrant air is charged with the breath of sweet incense circulating through it, the nāgaraka with his associates and friends, awaits there the arrival of his mistress. This completes his daily life.¹

A word here about the nāgaraka's friends whom we meet again and again in the Kāmasūtra, will not be out of place. Besides the many artists and craftsmen who served him in his quest of love and pleasure and who are called his mitras or companions by Vātsyāyana, the nāgaraka appears to have possessed some real, true and devoted friends. Vātsyāyana says that fast and genuine friendship often sprang up among those who had grown up together from infancy tended by the same nurse, who in early boyhood were fellow playmates or were at school together, those who were marked by the same temperament and the same tastes in pleasure and sport, were attached to each other by mutual obligations and whose closest secrets were known to each other. Vātsyāyana regards it particularly fortunate in friendship when the friendship has come down between two families for several generations, has never been tainted by selfishness or greed, nor has been changed by time or by any considerations whatsoever and where the mutual secrets have never been betrayed.²

SPORTS AND FESTIVITIES

Besides the various sports and amusements that enlivened the daily life of the nagaraka, there were many high days and holidays when he made merry with his friends and companions. With regard to all these games and festivities enjoyed in company, Vātsyāyana gives the sage advice that they can be relished best in the company of friends of the same social status, but not with those that are either above or below one, because permanent good relations and mutual understanding can only be established when each party in a sport seeks to afford pleasure to the other and where each is honoured and respected by the other.¹

Vātsyāyana classifies the occasional festivities into five groups. In the first place he mentions the festivals in connection with the worship of different deities (samāja, yātrā and ghaṭā), sometimes attended with grand processions; then come the goṣṭhis or social gatherings of both sexes; next āpānakas or drinking parties and udyāna-yātrās or garden-parties, and last of all various social diversions in which many persons take part (samasyā kṛiḍā).²

At the temple of Sarasvatī, the goddess of learning and the fine arts, on a fixed day every fortnight, that is, on the tithi or lunar phase specially auspicious to the deity worshipped, a samāja or an assemblage of nāgarakas was held regularly. They were accompanied by musicians, dancers and other artists permanently employed by them for performances in honour of the deity. Besides, when any itinerant parties of actors, dancers or other such "artists" visited the town, they were afforded an opportunity of showing their skill at the temple before the divinity. On the day following the performance the party had to be given their stipulated rewards, and then they might be dismissed or asked to repeat their performances at the pleasure of their patrons. On special occasions, when performances on a grand scale were arranged, parties of actors might co-operate with each other and give a joint performance and it was the duty of the corporation or guild (gaṇa); to which the nāgaraka belonged, to honour and treat with hospitality the strangers who attended these gatherings. Similar festivities of various kinds were held on a grand scale in honour of different deities according to the customs appertaining to each.¹ On some of these occasions there were processions (yātrā) like the procession of images that Fa-Hien saw in Khotan when "they swept and watered the streets inside the city, making a grand display in the lanes and by-ways."² In these processions both men and women joined and 'Vātsyāyana says that they afforded opportunities for meeting one's lady-love.³ Even a virtuous matron could attend a religious ceremony with the permission of her husband.⁴

We now come to the goṣṭhī or social gathering where the nāgaraka diverts himself in pleasant talk with persons of the same status and position as himself by their education, intelligence, character, wealth and age; there he engages in competitions in making verses or in various other sports of skill and art.¹ Affording, as these goṣṭhis did, opportunities for the nāgaraka to exhibit his intellectual accomplishments and mastery of the arts they were most popular with him, being attended by him every afternoon and they were also held on a comparatively large scale on special occasions. Of the branches of literary art in which competitions were held, we may glean the following from Vātsyāyana's list of the sixty four arts: there were competitions in the extempore composition of verses, completion of a stanza of which a part only was given, the proper reading of books, with proper intonation and accent, either singly or in groups, the reading of passages in prose or verse that on account of many harsh sounds were hard to pronounce, and the art of composing and expounding passages written in a secret code or cypher. These competitions required knowledge of foreign tongues and provincial dialects, knowledge of lexicons and special vocabularies, of metres and the figures of rhetoric, the knowledge of dramas and their stories, in short, a very comprehensive literary and artistic training. One game is described called pratimālā in which a number of persons had to recite verses one after another, the condition being that every reciter must repeat a verse commencing with the letter with which the previous speaker's verse ended and any one unable to supply his verse sufficiently quickly had to pay a forfeit. Besides these literary competitions, there were tests of proficiency in the fine arts such as painting, singing, instrumental music and the like and also of manual skill and dexterity in many of the practical arts such as the stringing together of flowers in a garland and so on.¹

At these gatherings were invited gaṇikās or brilliant artists who by their education and knowledge of the arts, could please the nāgaraka by meeting him on his own ground, viz., in mental and aesthetic culture, and who were therefore loved and honoured by the people. Sometimes the parties were held at the house of one of the gaṇikās, or the nāgarakas met at each other's house, or they assembled in the sabhā, the public hall of the city or of the gaṇa or corporation to which every citizen belonged. Here the citizens came together to discuss politics and philosophy, or to hold competitions in literature or art, or merely to enjoy themselves in convivial parties. This sabhā of Vātsyāyana is the direct descendant of the saṃiti or pariṣad of the Vedic times, at one of which, viz., that of the Pañcālas, Śvetaketu Āruṇeya, who is reputed to be the founder of the science of erotics, was defeated by a Kṣatriya.²

At the goṣṭhis were also discussed the sixty-four Pañcāla or kāma-kalās and Vātsyāyana declares that a person possessing a knowledge of this sixty-four, even though devoid of all the other sciences, leads the talk at the goṣṭhis of men and women; and on the other hand, a person who speaks cleverly on other subjects but knows not the sixty-four, is not much respected in the discussions in the assembly of the learned.³

At the goṣṭhī one is neither to speak too much in Sanskrit for he may then be considered a pedant, just as in England two centuries ago to write English in strict accordance with orthography and syntax was considered not necessary for a gentleman; nor should the nāgaraka speak too much in a local dialect, because then he ran the risk of being regarded as uneducated and uncultured; he should strike a middle course and have full control over both and then he was sure to win great respect.¹ The prevalent language of the period as seen in inscriptions and in the Mahāyāna literature, bears testimony to the fact that the current speech at the time, at least among the cultured classes, was a mixture of Sanskrit and Prakrit. The learned people like Aśvaghoṣa, of course, wrote pure Sanskrit, but the language of conversation among the educated was apparently a mixture of Sanskrit and the provincial dialect (deśabhāṣā) as recommended by the author of the Kāmasūtra.

There were goṣṭhīs for sinister purposes too in the days of Vātsyāyana who warns the nāgaraka against frequenting an assembly that is disliked by the people, that is not governed by proper rules and hence is likely to indulge in license or to run beyond the bounds of decency; nor should he attend a goṣṭhī that is intent upon doing mischief to others. A person wins success in life by attending an association that makes the imparting of pleasure to people its sole business and has sport and diversion for its sole object.²

The goṣṭhī on account of its association with art, refinement and culture, was much appreciated by the people in Vātsyāyana's times. A nāgaraka was expected to be liberal in spending on goṣṭhīs and his success in courtship and love depended in no small measure on his power to shine in the sports and festivities including the goṣṭhī and saṃāja.¹ In Bhāsa's dramas we meet with many references to goṣṭhī; his Avimāra mourns the supposed loss of his friend who was humorous at goṣṭhīs.²

Women also met together in goṣṭhīs or social assemblies among themselves. For an unmarried girl it was considered a qualification that she was fond of goṣṭhīs and kalās. Married ladies also sometimes, with the permission of their husbands, instituted among their own friends goṣṭhīs or social gatherings where they discussed artistic and literary matters. But a married woman who was too fond of instituting goṣṭhīs was looked upon with suspicion, specially one who arranged such gatherings in the house of a youthful neighbour.³ In Bhāsa's Avimāra (Act V) the maids invite the Vidūṣaka to recount a story which they would listen to among their goṣṭhījanas in the inner court.⁴

Besides the goṣṭhīs the nāgarakas also met at each other's house to hold drinking parties where they drank various kinds of liquors with sauces of various tastes and flavours, but abstention from wine was considered a special qualification in a nāgaraka.¹

GARDEN PARTIES

Next we come to another diversion which was very dear to the soul of the nāgaraka, viz., udyāna-yātrā or picnics in gardens. Every great city in those days was surrounded by extensive gardens where the residents of the city could find some relief from the congested streets of the town. Round Kapilavastu, says the Lalitaristara, five hundred gardens sprang up for the diversions of Bodhisattva, and prince Siddhārtha went out through the gates of the city for enjoying himself in the gardens outside.² In the Kāmasūtra also we find that these gardens were outside the town and a whole day was spent in the picnic there. Early in the morning a party of well-dressed nāgarakas would go out of the town mounted on horses accompanied by ganikās and followed by servants ; there they would arrange for their daily meal and pass the time in pleasant games of chance or in diverting themselves with the fights of cocks, quails or rams or in any other way that they pleased, in the afternoon they would return wearing some token of remembrance of the picnic such as a bunch of flowers or a twig from a garden-tree. Similar parties were enjoyed in connection with sports in water, which took place in artificial lakes or tanks from which all mischievous water-animals had first been removed.³ Picnicking in the gardens outside the city was very popular in the days of Vātsyāyana who again and again speaks of it. His description of udyānayaṭrā agrees in every particular with that given in mṛcchakaṭika, the only difference being that in the drama, Cārudatta goes out in a bullock-cart instead of on horseback. A nāgaraka's liberality was often tested by his readiness to spend on these garden picnics and dramatic performances. A king who has many wives is advised by Vātsyāyana to please every one of them by such shows and garden-parties.¹ Unmarried girls, and even married women, sometimes went to these picnics; a virgin on her way to a garden-party was sometimes snatched away from her friends and guardians for the purposes of marriage.² Ladies perhaps went on such picnics in parties of their own sex, because Vātsyāyana says that udyāna-yātrās afforded opportunities for meeting and making offers of love to them.³ But picnics arranged by married women appear to be rather rare. It was only a punarbhū, that is, a widow who had attached herself to a second husband, that induced her adopted lover to institute these picnics and convivial assemblies at which she herself took part.⁴

SAMASYĀ-KRĪDĀ

Last of all we come to the sports that Vātsyāyana calls samasyā-kṛīdā or saṁbhūya-kṛīdā, that is social diversions in which a number of persons took part. He says that they varied with each country and province. Of about a score of them he has given only the names from which their character may sometimes be surmised. Some of them are well-known up to the present day, at least in parts of India, such as Kaumudī-jāgara, in which the whole night of the full moon in the month of Āśvina is passed without sleep by playing at dice or similar other amusements, and the Holākā or Holī on the day of the vernal full moon in the month of Phālguna ; such is also the Ālola-caturthī or Hindolotsava in the month of Śrāvaṇa. The Hallīsaka, accompanied by dancing and music and supposed to be similar to the Rāsotsava described in the Bhāgavata-Purāṇa, is referred to by Vātsyāyana and a form of it is still current in Kāthiāwād. The festival of Suvasantaka reminds us of the Dule-vasantīyā of the Sitabenga Cave-Inscription which tells us that at this "swing-festival of the vernal full-moon, frolic and music abound and people tie around their necks garlands thick with jasmine flowers."¹ We are also reminded of the Kāmadevānuyāna of Bhāsa's Cārudatta (Act I) and of the Madanodyāna-yātrā of Bhavabhūti's Mālati-Mādhava (Act I). It appears that persons of both sexes took part in many of these festivities. At such festivals as Kaumudī-jāgara, Suvasantaka and Aṣṭamī Candraka, the women of the cities and towns entered the harem of the king and sported with the royal ladies there.²

SPORTS OF GIRLS

Some of the sports of girls have been described by Vātsyāyana, as well as some of their playthings. The girls took delight in making garlands of flowers, building small houses of earth, of wood, playing with dolls, or in cooking imaginary food with such materials as earth etc. They sometimes played games of chance with dice or cards, or other games like “odd and even,” the game of “close fists” and so on ; or they might play the game of finding out the middle finger or the sport with six pebbles ; sometimes a number of girls played together at games involving some exercise of the limbs (Kṣvedītakāni) such as hide and seek, spinning round holding each other's out-stretched arms, blindman's buff, games with salt or heaps of wheat.¹ We see from this list that many of these sports and games are much the same as those in vogue at the present day among Indian girls and boys.

The games and festivities of the nāgaraka are, as we see from the description given above, the diversions of a seeker after pleasure and amusement—of one that had plenty of leisure to enjoy and an ample fortune to provide the means of enjoyment. Among manly sports, wrestling matches were known to Vātsyāyana, but the nāgaraka appears to have been rather a spectator at these games than one who took an active part in them ; the Kāmasūtra also speaks of hunting as a pastime that becomes a source of pleasure by practice, when one has acquired some skill in it and this seems to be the one manly sport that the nāgaraka knows of.²

CHAPTER VI

THE POSITION OF WOMEN

While the life of a nāgaraka has been painted by Vātsyāyana as a round of pleasures, that of his wife presents a striking contrast and is a round of duties. The picture presented by him of a wife is in no way inferior to the ideal held up in the Dharmaśāstras and in many respects he gives greater details.¹ She attends on her husband with all the love and devotion a devotee shows to the deity he worships. She ministers to his personal needs, looks after his food and drink, as well as his toilet and his amusements; she tries to appreciate his likes and dislikes, welcomes his friends with proper presents, respects and loves his parents and relatives and is liberal to his servants; when she finds that he is coming home, she hastens to meet him and waits upon him herself; in his games and sports she follows him; even when offended, she does not speak too bitterly to him. She may attend a festive assembly only with his permission and in the company of her friends. She does not even give away anything without his knowledge. She should do nothing that might rouse his suspicion against her fidelity; she should avoid the company of women of questionable character such as female ascetics, actresses,

1 For the section of the Kāmasūtra dealing with the character of the virtuous wife see pp. 224-46. This section has not been dealt with here in detail as the whole of it has been translated by Prof. P. Peterson in his paper on "Vātsyāyana on the Duties of a Hindu Wife," read before the Anthropological Society of Bombay (16th December, 1891) and published in the Journal of the Anthro. Soc. of Bom. 1892, pp. 459-66. The same learned Professor has written upon "Courtship in Ancient India," as given in the section of the Kāmasūtra dealing with it (Jour. Bom. Br. R.A.S. xviii), and hence, we have omitted a consideration of that section including the rules of marriage.

fortune-tellers, or women given to the practice of black art (mūlakārikā), nor should she loiter about in solitary parts of the house. She might take lessons in the Kāmasūtra or in the subsidiary arts, if her husband so wishes, and he may occasionally himself give these lessons.¹ One is here reminded of Bhāsa's Udayana who calls his beloved queen "his dear disciple,"² and of the beautiful line of Kālidāsa (with whom our author has so many points of contact) where Ajā mourns the loss of Indumati, his "beloved pupil in the fine arts."³

There is an atmosphere of control and restraint about her. In her talk she is moderate and never speaks or laughs aloud; she does not return an answer when reproved by her husband's parents. She does not give herself airs when she enjoys great good fortune. In her dress she practises moderation: when going out on festive occasions, she wears a few ornaments and only a few garments of fine and soft texture, uses perfumes and ointments very moderately and adorns herself only with white flowers. But when she is going to meet her husband, she takes the greatest care with her toilet; then she makes herself tidy, sweet and clean, she puts on many ornaments, wears flowers of various hues and smells, uses perfumes and in every way makes herself attractive. Flowers were worn in garlands hanging from the neck (sraja), or in chaplets (āpīḍa) on the head, or were simply put in the hair,⁴ or in elaborate ornaments for the ears (karnapūra or karnapatra). Another item of a woman's toilet was the paint or the dots and patches on the forehead and cheeks, put on in various designs (viśeṣaka). Sometimes leaves of such plants as tamāla were used with it, as we find in the Saundarananda-Kāvya.¹ Vātsyāyana advises a wife never to present herself before her husband without some ornaments on her person even when alone with him.² This idea is found in Indian literature as early as the time of Yāska, who says, "to the man who understands her meaning, the Veda shows herself as a loving wife shows herself to her husband in all her rich apparel." As Yāska here is quoting a verse of the Rgveda where it occurs at least four times, the idea belongs to the very earliest period of Indian thought.³ But when the husband is away from home the wife goes, as it were, into mourning; she puts away all her ornaments and finery with the exception of those that mark her married condition, such as the bangles of shells, only one on each wrist.⁴ At that time she also practises fasts and austerities in honour of the gods and does not go to visit even the near relatives except in very urgent cases when they are in some danger, or when there are some festivities there, and even then, she must not change her quiet dress indicating the separation (pravāsa-veśa); and she should never go there but in the company of her husband's people and must not stay there long. When the husband returns home she goes to meet him as she is, then she worships the gods, specially Kāma-deva, the god of love, and offers gifts of food to men and birds.

Ordinarily also it is the wife who looks after the performance of the daily worship of gods at the household temple and the due performance of rites and the offering of gifts at the three fixed periods in the day—morning, mid-day and evening. She takes upon herself the observance of the vows and fasts that fall to the share of her husband. Sometimes the lady vowed gifts and offerings to the gods, and when her lord acquired some wealth, or obtained success in any venture, or regained his health after some illness she carried out her vow.¹ To institute the worship of some deity was one of the dear desires of the women.² The qualities enumerated by Suddhodana as requisite for a bride for the young Siddhārtha³ are very much the same as those in the picture given above by Vātsyāyana of a virtuous and devoted wife.

With the permission of her husband the wife takes upon herself the whole care and management of the family. She prepares a budget for the whole year and regulates the expenditure in proportion with the annual income. She must also know how to keep the daily accounts and total up the daily receipts and expenditure; Manu also lays down that the husband should appoint the wife to receive and spend the wealth, by keeping accounts, as Medhatithi explains.⁴ When the husband is inclined to spend beyond his means, or to run into improper expenditure, she remonstrates with him in secret. She lays in a stock of all articles necessary for consumption and replenishes her stores at the proper season. She knows how to calculate and pay the wages and salaries of the servants, has to look after agriculture and cattle, and also to take care of the animals and birds kept for sport by the master of the house. We have seen that the garden also is a special charge of the lady of the house. When the husband is absent from home she also looks after his affairs and tries to administer them carefully so that they may not suffer by his absence; on such occasions she endeavours to minimise the expenditure to the best of her power and to increase the resources of the family by sales and purchases carried on through trusty servants. She has to attend to the kitchen, and besides, she employs her leisure in spinning cotton and also in doing some weaving.

POOR WOMEN

Many of the poorer women,—widows, helpless women, or those who had adopted the ascetic's vow (pravrajitā), earned a living by spinning and weaving as at the time of Kauṭilya, and got their wages from a government officer, the Sūtrādhyakṣa, "the Superintendent of Yarn," and the sales and purchases were made with the Panyādhyakṣa, "the Superintendent of Manufactures." In the villages, the peasant women did various kinds of work under the control of the government officer (Āyuktaka) in charge of the village or the headman who lived upon a share of the agricultural produce. Under his orders these women perform unpaid work (viṣṭi) for him, they fill up his granaries, take things in or out of his house, clean and decorate his residence, or work in his fields; they also take from him cotton, wool, flax or hemp for spinning yarn and the bark of trees, or thread, for preparing wearing apparel; moreover, they made with him transactions of sale, purchase or exchange of various articles. Similarly the women in dairy settlements (vrajas) transacted business with the gavādhyakṣa, "the Superintendent of Cattle."¹

THE JOINT-FAMILY

The joint family system seems to have obtained in Vātsyāyana's age. The wife of the householder has to wait upon his parents and to obey them implicitly as we have already seen, and moreover, she has to show proper regard to all senior relations (gurus) and to his sisters as well as to their husbands. But nowhere are her duties to his brothers mentioned, though a woman with many younger brothers of her husband is referred to in one place¹ showing probably that sometimes the brothers lived together, but more often they established separate households when they got married, as it was prescribed in some of the Dharmaśāstras, in Manu for example, that after the death of the parents the brothers might live jointly or they might separate for the sake of increasing the dharma, for, if they lived separate, their spiritual merit would increase and hence separation was sanctioned by dharma: the meaning is that if they lived apart "each of them had to kindle the sacred fire, to offer separately the agnihotra, to perform the five great sacrifices and so forth, and hence each gains merit separately." This principle had been recognised from very early times as we have it clearly laid down by Gautama, the author of the earliest of the extant Dharmasūtras.²

POLYGAMY

Polygamy appears to have been prevalent in Vātsyāyana's days among the wealthy. Kings generally considered it a privilege to have a crowded harem, a harem "with a thousand spouses" is spoken of by Vātsyāyana.³ This is in line with what the Lalita-vistara says about Māyādevī that she was the best and greatest of the thousands of women of Śuddhodana. The Buddhacarita mentions the same fact though not in such extravagant terms.¹ Princes, high officials and the rich also married more than one wife. Vātsyāyana says that the wealthy people had generally a plurality of spouses who, outwardly no doubt, appeared to enjoy many objects of pleasure, but in reality, were very miserable indeed, as the husband was but one and the claimants to his affection were many; and he gives the sage advice that it is better to have a poor husband even though he may not have many qualities to recommend him than to have a clever man whose favours have to be shared with many.² A single wife for a wealthy man, however, was not unknown: we read in Vātsyāyana of a nāgaraka who may be devoted to one wife (ekacārin)³ Prince Nanda of the Saundarananda-Kāvya was such a person. The majority of the people appeared to have only one wife; but if she had no child, or if she bore only daughters and the continuity of the family was in danger, then the husband might marry again. In case of barrenness, Vatsyayana counsels the wife herself to induce the husband to marry again and look upon the newly married bride as a younger sister.⁴ He advises a man with many wives not to be partial, neither to show any disregard towards any one in particular, nor to allow any offence on the part of any one of them to pass unnoticed.⁵

ANTAH PURA

We have already seen that every house had an antahpura, or inner suite of apartments where the ladies resided in seclusion, guarded against intrusion from any stranger; not even women except those of approved character, were admitted within.¹ Bhāsa's Vasantasenā complains that she had the misfortune of not being entitled to enter into the inner courtyard of Cārudatta's house.² It was not considered decent for the wife of a nāgaraka to stand at the door and look out or to observe people in the street from her windows; even when she hastens to meet her husband coming home, she does not go out into the street or to the door but waits for him inside the house.³ Nevertheless, on the occasion of religious festivities and processions, she could accompany the images of the gods with the permission of her husband. The inability of women to protect themselves against temptations as compared with men, is recognised by Vātsyāyana and he like Manu, condemns the absence of a restraining guardian (nirañkuṣatva) for a woman.⁴

The kings having a large number of wives took greater care than the ordinary nāgaraka in confining them in seraglios guarded by officers of proved honesty and purity. No man was allowed to enter into the royal harem except relatives and servants and in some provinces, artisans; Brāhmanas were allowed to get into the harem for supplying flowers to the ladies, with whom they conversed separated by a screen. There were in the harem female officers, the kañcukīyā and the mahattarikā who carried presents of garlands, perfumes and garments from the ladies to the king who also sent gifts in return. In the afternoon, the king paid a visit to the harem and met all the ladies assembled together and conversed with them in accordance with their rank and position.¹

EDUCATION OF WOMEN

The fact that the mistress of the house was expected to keep the daily accounts, to prepare the annual budget of receipts and expenditure, and supervise in general over the purse, proves, beyond a doubt, that women ordinarily were literate. Besides, from what Vātsyāyana says, it is apparent that an ordinary woman could receive and reply to love letters smuggled into ear ornaments, chaplets or garlands made of flowers carried by female messengers (patrahārīdūtī). Such love letters not infrequently contained verses and songs having special reference to the beloved and replies were obtained from her.² Unless women had some education, this would be without meaning.

Higher education (śāstragrahaṇa), however, was not so common among them, as Vātsyāyana himself says that women did not ordinarily get any education in the śāstras, but our author avers that the daughters of kings and nobles, as also the gaṇikās, were highly educated and "had their intelligence trained and sharpened by the śāstras," and he advises that a woman might learn either the whole or a part of the work (śāstra) composed by himself from a person who by character and attainments could be trusted.³ The sixty-four subsidiary sciences that had to be studied along with the Kāmasūtra, included many that required, as we have seen, no inconsiderable proficiency in belles lettres, in the humanities in general. Such accomplishments as extempore composition of verses (mānasī-kāvya-kriyā) and the completion of fragmentary verses (kāvya-samasyā-pūraṇam) required a ready facility in versification that could be acquired only by a highly educated girl; and such sports as pratimālā required the memorising of a large mass of verses and good literature. In Vātsyāyana's opinion a knowledge of the Kāmasūtra with its subsidiary sciences would be useful to all women, both high and low, rich and poor. A poor woman who on account of the absence of her husband, finds herself in great distress and difficulty, might earn a decent living even in a foreign country by means of the knowledge of these sciences. A woman whose husband has been away from home without making provision for her, is advised by Manu also to live by the arts, by such śilpas as have nothing reprehensible in them. On the other hand, Vātsyāyana affirms that, a daughter of wealthy parents, if accomplished in the arts, might win the affection of her husband even if he happens to have a large number of wives. We see, moreover, from Vātsyāyana's work, as well as from contemporary literature, that a knowledge of the arts was considered necessary for all women.¹ The bride for Prince Siddhārtha was required, according to his father, to be "versed in the sacred literature (sāstra) and skilled in the arts, even like a Gaṇikā."² The carama-buddha could be born only of a mother "versed in many sciences," and Māyadevi satisfied this requirement; besides, she was well skilled in the arts.³

WIDOW RE-MARRIAGE

The position of a widow who wished for a second husband, has been clearly defined by Vātsyāyana. There was no regular marriage for a widow; but if a woman who had lost her husband, was of weak character and was unable to restrain her desires, she might ally herself for a second time to a man who was a seeker after pleasures (bhogin) and was desirable on account of his excellent qualities as a lover, and such a woman was called a punarbhū. Vātsyāyana quotes the opinions of several teachers as to how far, in the selection of her second master, the punarbhū should be swayed by the excellence of the qualities of the man of her choice or by the chances of participating in the joys of life, and he concludes that in his opinion it was best for her to follow the natural inclinations of her own heart. The connection with her was of a loose character and she enjoyed a degree of independence unknown to the wife wedded according to sacramental rites. When the punarahū seeks her lover's house, she assumes the role of a mistress, patronises his wives, is generous to his servants and treats his friends with familiarity ; she chides the lover herself if he gives any cause for quarrel. She shows greater knowledge of the arts than his wedded wives and seeks to please the lover with the sixty-four Kāmakalās. She takes part in sports and festivities, drinking parties, garden picnics, and other games and amusements. She might leave her lover (nāyaka), but if she did so of her own accord, she had to restore to him all presents given by him, except the tokens of love, mutually exchanged between them ; if she is driven out, she does not give back any thing.¹

The position of the punarbhū is therefore quite distinct from that of the wedded wife who participated with her husband in all religious observances and had to live with decency in the antahpura ; the position of the punarbhū approaches nearer to that of a mistress than that of a wedded wife. In the king's harem where there were separate quarters and suites of chambers for the various types of women, the punarbhūs occupied a position midway between the devīs or queens who were quartered in the innermost apartments, and the ganikās and actresses in the outermost, and this exactly indicates also the position occupied by them in society. Vātsyāyana indicates this in another place where he places the punarbhū between the virgin (kanyā) and the courtesan (veśyā)¹ and says that the establishment of sexual relations with either the courtesans or the punarbhūs was not considered as right, neither was it absolutely condemned, because pleasure was the guiding motive in all such connections.² It is clear that in Vātsyāyana's opinion there could not be any second marriage of the widow. Manu, whose code must have received its present form about that time, declares in unmistakable terms that in the sacred texts concerning marriage, the re-marriage of widows was nowhere prescribed.³ Vātsyāyana's attitude towards the question of widow-remarriage shows that in his days, public opinion allowed the widow to live with the man of her choice as his mistress, just as public opinion was not particularly nice or fastidious about making love to courtesans, but she could never receive the same regard, or acquire the same position, as the married wife.

About the question of marriage in general, Vātsyāyana gives it as his considered opinion that for a man of any of the four varṇas or castes, kāma or desire should be provided its scope in the acceptance, according to the prescriptions of the holy writ, of a maiden who belongs to the same caste as himself and who had no contact with any one before, and this, he says, leads to progeny and to fame and is also sanctioned by popular usage ; and again, he affirms, in another connection, that when a maiden of the same caste, not given to any one before, is married in accordance with the prescriptions of the holy writ, then one secures dharma and artha, offspring, high connection, an increase of friends and partisans, and also genuine, untarnished love. He further adds definitely that the contrary procedure of marrying girls of higher castes or of those who had previously been accepted by others, was absolutely prohibited, but that public opinion was indifferent with regard to connection with women of the lower castes (if not actually outside the pale of Aryan society), as also with widows and courtesans, for such relations were not considered as amounting to marriage at all, but entered into merely for pleasure for its own sake.¹

2 वेस्यासु पुनस्य च न शिष्टो न प्रतिषिद्धः, सुखाद्यन्तर्गते । — Ibid, p. 59 (sūtra 3).

3 न विवाहविधायकं विधवाविद्वन् पुनः । — Manu, ix. 65.

Vātsyāyana once refers to the *anumaraṇa*² of a woman upon the death of her lover ; perhaps it has a reference to the practice of sahamarāṇa or dying with the husband, that is, burning herself on the same funeral pyre, but we cannot be sure about it upon such meagre evidence.

FEMALE ASCETICS

Some women also took the monastic vow like men and lived upon the charity of the people. Nuns of the three main religions of India at that time are referred to in the Kāmasūtra. We have the Buddhist nun śramaṇā and her Jaina sister, kṣapaṇā or kṣapaṇikā ; and associated with them we find the tāpaṇī whom I take to be the woman who belonging to the Brahmanic faith, has renounced the world. Besides, we read of women who had their heads shaven (muṇḍāḥ). All of them are generally spoken of as pravrajitās or bhikṣukīs, i.e., female ascetics or mendicants. It appears, from what Vātsyāyana says, that these female mendicant orders did not enjoy a high reputation for morality: they are included among those who are declared to be company unfit for decent married ladies.¹ Some of the mendicant women were proficient in the arts and their help was often sought by the nāgaraka in affairs of love; the house of the bhikṣukī often formed the rendezvous for lovers; she was often employed to carry messages of love and was regarded as a go-between who could easily create confidence and succeed in her mission.² Vātsyāyana, however, positively asserts that the love of the female ascetic was never to be sought for by a nāgaraka, though a former teacher had expressed a contrary view.³ All this does not imply that female ascetics were in general considered as depraved but that some of them abused the confidence of the public and thus forfeited the respect with which they had previously been regarded, just like some of the male ascetics and mendicants who erred from the right path,⁴ and we learn from Kauṭilya that the respect which the parivrājikā or bhikṣukī commanded in society was made use of in order to fish out political secrets.⁵ In Bhavabhūti's Mālatīmādhava we find the parivrājikā, Kāmandakī, represented as a highly respectable lady who took great interest in the love affair between the hero and the heroine and worked hard for its fruition. This drama is an illustration, as it were, of the Kāmasūtra, and Bhavabhūti in this drama shows himself very well-versed in Vātsyāyana's writings.⁶

1 Kāmasūtra, p. 59 (sūtras 1-3) ; and p. 184 (sūtra 1).

2 सङ्गस्य चानुसरणं ब्रूयात् ।—Ibid, p. 316 (sūtra 53).

ARTS AND CRAFTS

The age of Vātsyāyana being characterised by very refined tastes and æsthetic perceptions, as we have seen above, there was joy and consequently beauty in life, and it was necessarily an age when the arts flourished and the crafts prospered. Vātsyāyana's nāgaraka is a man of varied culture and from the picture that we have obtained of his life and surrounding, of his home and friends, and of his sports and amusements, there can be no doubt that he was a great patron of the arts; in fact, it is evident that every one who aspired to be a member of cultured society, had to acquire some proficiency in poetry and music, painting and sculpture and to possess some knowledge of a host of minor arts, the twice sixty-four *kalas*¹ enumerated by our author. This knowledge of the arts was evidently an essential part of his education and without this modicum of practical acquaintance with them he would not be respected, as Vātsyāyana says, in the assemblies of the cultured and educated people.² The ideal nāgaraka, according to Vātsyāyana, was he who possessed, in addition to a healthy physique, good birth and independent means of livelihood, a knowledge of the various arts, who was learned and eloquent and was moreover, a poet, well skilled in telling stories, who was fond of all the literary and artistic competitions and festivities including goṣṭhis and dramatic performances and above all, a person whose character was marked by largeness of heart and liberality, by affection and love. Skill in the sixty-four arts subsidiary to

1 The sixty-four śilpa-kalās and the sixty-four pāñcūlikā or sāmpṛa-yogika-kalās enumerated in the Kāmasūtra, pp. 92-183. The former are called karma-kalās and the latter kāma-kalās in the Lalitavistara (Chaps. xii and xxi).

the Kāmasūtra as well as a knowledge of the Sūtras themselves was an essential part of the qualification of every cultured man and woman.¹ To win a girl in marriage called for an exercise of many of the arts. A maiden had to be propitiated by rare and curious objects of art, by nicely recited romances and by sweet songs; if she showed a partiality for feats of "magic," her favour was to be won by performing various tricks of legerdemain; if she manifested a curiosity for the arts (kalās), her lover must demonstrate before her his skill in them; the art of gathering flowers in bouquets, or weaving them into chaplets and garlands was specially to be cultivated.² Tournaments in which a charming and rarely accomplished girl like Gopā was the prize of the victor (jaya-patākā),³ appear to have been held in cities ruled by a semi-republican government like that of the Sākyakula. If a man was uncultured and ignorant of the arts it would be a source of great sorrow to his wife who, Vātsyāyana suggests, might herself be more proficient in them than he.⁴ In the Lalitavistara we find that unless Siddhārtha showed his skill in some of the arts (śilpas), Dandapāṇi Sākya refused to give his girl in marriage to him, prince though he was.⁵ It may easily be imagined that art in all its forms was likely to develop and prosper in a society where men and women were inspired by such ideals, and that at the same time the sciences that analysed and ministered to the manifold forms of artistic expression of this highly intellectual and cultured community also grew and were assiduously pursued. Not only erotics, to which Vātsyāyana devoted himself, but also the sciences of æsthetics and poetics received a great impetus during this period. Bharata's Nāṭyaśāstra appears to be a product of this age of æsthetic culture which reached its culmination in the great Kālidāsa, the most careful student of Bharata and Vātsyāyana.

We have already had evidence of the nāgaraka's good taste in house-building and architecture and also of his fondness for poetry and romance. He always had a poetical work on a table in his room, and we have seen from his skill at the goṣṭhis where kāvya-samasyās or competitions in poetic skill were held every evening, that readiness in versification and a wide reading of poetical literature in general, formed the essential accomplishment of every one of the class to which he belonged. While wooing the maiden of his choice, he was expected to recite sweetly agreeable stories that would just apply to his case, or the romances of Sakuntalā and Avimāraka and of the heroes and heroines of literature who had prospered in their loves. One skilled in reciting these stories and romances had, according to Vātsyāyana, the best chance of success in love-making.¹

The Pictorial art, ālekhyam, was one of the foremost of the sixty-four kalās cultivated during this period. Every cultured man had in his house a drawing board, citrāphalaka, and a vessel (samudgaka) for holding brushes and other requisites of painting.² Pictures, citrakarma, appear to have been drawn, as the commentator of Vātsyāyana explains, both on the walls (bhitti) as well as on panels or boards (phalaka); Vātsyāyana advises a lover who wants to attract the attention of the lady whose charms have captivated him, to put in places frequented by her, paintings (probably representing himself) done on panels¹; in another place we read of a kiss imprinted on a picture (citrakarma),² most probably on a wall. For citrakarma or painting, the surface of the wall appears to have been most ordinarily used in ancient India, as appears from a passage in the Mudrārākṣasa where the futility of the earnest efforts of a statesman is compared to "the composition of a picture (citrakarma) without the wall."³ The same idea is found in the Lalitavistara where the daughters of Māra declare that it was easier to paint pictures on the sky than to tempt Bodhisattva.⁴ Bharata clearly refers to fresco-painting by the phrase citrakarma; he says that the walls of the theatre-hall were to be decorated with citrakarma after they had been carefully plastered, coated with lime and nicely polished, the paintings consisting of the representation of male and female figures, of creeper-patterns and a record of great deeds.⁵ It is fortunate that in our country where we have so few pictorial records of the past, the caves at Ajanta have preserved a few frescoes, the solitary survivals of this age of prolific artistic production.

Vātsyāyana speaks also of the *ākhyānaka-paṭa*¹ which is evidently a roll of canvas containing the representation of a short story in several scenes like the yamapaṭa which was spread by a spy of Cāṇakya before the people in Candana-dasa's house and was exhibited by him with songs;² we may add that the direct descendant of this yamapaṭa may still be seen in the villages of Bengal. Balls with various designs painted on them in a variety of colours, as also water jugs of various elegant shapes with many paintings, are mentioned by Vātsyāyana as welcome presents to a maiden whose favours one is courting.³ The Lalitavistara mentions a similar plaything for children, viz, jugs beautifully painted on the outside but containing valueless things within.⁴

According to Vātsyāyana a welcome object of presentation to maidens was a colour-box (paṭolikā) containing the following colours:—alaktaka (the red dye obtained from lac), manahsilā (red arsenic), haritāla (yellow orpiment), hīngula (vermillion) and śyāma-varṇaka; the last named appears to be a vegetable dye, black, blue or green because the word śyāma is used to signify all these colours. The commentator says that it means a powder used in painting, of rājāvarta, a mineral substance.⁵ A painter surrounded by many cups (mallakas) of wet colours is referred to in Bhāsa's Cārudatta.⁶ Jayamaṅgalā quotes a beautiful verse apparently from a śilpaśāstra about the six great requisites of painting, viz., "knowledge of appearances, correct perception, measure and structure of forms, action of feelings on forms, infusion of grace or artistic representation, similitude and artistic manner of using the brush and colours." Bharata speaks of the pictorial representation of the feelings or rather sentiments, the rasas, by different colours, the erotic or amatory sentiment is represented by the śyāma or dark colour spoken of above, the sentiment of mirth by white; the piteous sentiment is grey (kapota) and the choleric is red, the heroic is yellowish white (gaura) and the terrible, black; the repulsive is blue and the amazing, yellow.*

Sculpture flourished as much as painting in the age of Vātsyāyana as is fully borne out by the numerous sculptural records that have come down to our time from that period. Vātsyāyana himself bears ample testimony to it: lakṣaṇa, carving on wood or stone was one of the sixty-four arts and every nāgaraka had in his house implements for working at it; similarly in every house there was a lathe and other arrangements for turning which, likewise, had its place among the sixty-four kalās. Vātsyāyana does not expressly mention an image of a god, but from what he says of the household temple where the gods were worshipped, of the worship offered and the gifts made to the deity to whom one was particularly devoted,¹ it is apparent that such images were familiar objects in his days. The Lalitavistara speaks of the numerous images of the gods that came down from their pedestals to do obeisance to the child Buddha when he made his appearance in the Devakula, the quarter of the palace occupied by the gods.² Besides these images for worship, representations in wood and stone of human beings, both male and female, puruṣapratimā and stripratimā—were used by the class for whom Vātsyāyana wrote, for decoration and as appertenances of love. Stands for placing images, or piṇḍolikās, are mentioned by Vātsyāyana, and life-size statues in wood or stone evidently stood on them in every nāgaraka's house, as Vātsyāyana speaks of very familiar uses made of them by lovers who often gave an indication of their passion for a lady by slyly kissing or embracing a statue in her sight. Similar other uses of portrait-statues in the harems of kings have been indicated by Vātsyāyana.³ In Bhāsa's Pratimā-nāṭaka (Act III) we read of the life-like representations of past kings ranged round a room as in a museum.

The demand for beautiful dolls and play-things of which the girls in Vātsyāyana's age appear to have been very fond, offered a vast field for the exercise of the plastic art. Vātsyāyana advises a young man trying to win the affection of a maiden to present her with dolls (duhitṛkā) made of wood, horn, ivory, cloth, wax, plaster or earth. Erotic pairs of human figures made of wood might also be presented; such erotic pairs (mithunam) cut of the leaves of trees were also sent by sweethearts to each other. Playthings liked by girls are miniature cooking utensils, small temples of the gods (deva-kula grhaka), toy animals like goats or rams and playthings made of earth, split bamboo or wood, such as cages of birds. Small vīnās, stands for images, ear ornaments made of wax or whatever other objects of art might be demanded by the girl of his choice, must be presented by the man courting her either openly or in secret.¹

MUSIC

Three kalās appertaining to music, singing (gīta), playing on instruments (vādya) and dancing (nṛtya) have been given by our author the first place in the list of arts; besides, there are more—udakavādya or playing on cups filled with water in varying proportions and vīṇāḍamarukavādyāni, that is, playing on string instruments of which the chief was the vīṇā and also on percussion instruments represented by the ḍamaru.² This last most probably represents the earliest from which in course of time had evolved the mṛdaṅga, which has lately been proved by one of our eminent scientists to be the most scientifically constructed percussion instrument ever used.³ The mṛdaṅga was already known to the Mahāvagga and Aśvaghoṣa speaks of songs sung to the accompaniment of the mṛdaṅga and of music produced on mṛdaṅgas struck by the fingers of women, and the Lalitavistara mentions it again and again with other varieties of drums.⁴

I am inclined to think that Vātsyāyana's ḍamaruka stands here for percussion instruments in general. The viṇā even then formed the most popular of the musical instruments in India, as is apparent from the fact that it formed a necessary piece of furniture in the rooms of every nāgaraka on which, as we have seen, he played almost every evening. Such a viṇā in the room of Nanda reminds the bereaved Sundarī of her dear absent husband,¹ and Bhāsa's Cārudatta is overwhelmed by its merits and is enthusiastic in its praises.² Of wind instruments, the flute made of a bamboo reed (vaṃśa) is mentioned by Vātsyāyana who praises it as capable of winning the heart of any girl when used in the way he prescribes.³ In the Buddhacarita and Lalitavistara it is called venu and is generally associated with the viṇā; and women play upon it.⁴ We have seen that music with or without dances was enjoyed by our nāgaraka every evening. The nāgaraka's sons received lessons in music at the gāndharvaśālā or college of music belonging perhaps to the city or to the gaṇa or corporation to which he belonged. Sweet and ravishing songs delighting the ear, form, according to Vātsyāyana, the readiest means of gaining the love of a man or a woman, and sometimes songs were specially composed containing a mention of the name and the family of the lover.⁵ Concerts (tūryya) are mentioned by Vātsyāyana, in which a party of musicians of both sexes sang and played together on various instruments. A party of such players was sometimes strengthened by its head (raṅgopajivin) giving his daughter in marriage to a clever artist who could help in the concert. An actress (ikṣanikā) is mentioned by Vātsyāyana as a very good carrier of love messages,¹ because, as Cārudatta says, a person making a living by the kalās, like her, must be very clever at all sorts of tricks.² Bharata says that sometimes on the stage the female parts were acted by men and an actress sometimes acted that of a man.³ Some actresses were maintained by the king and suitable quarters in the palace were set apart for them.⁴

CRAFTS

In a society where both men and women wore ornaments, it was quite natural that the crafts of the jeweller (maṇikāra) and goldsmith (sauvarṇika or suvarṇakāra) should prosper. The nāgaraka, when going to his club or to his garden picnic, wore ornaments and the king did so on his formal visit to the queens every afternoon.⁵ The statues that have come down from this age bear this out. It was, however, the demands of the ladies, who could not appear before their husbands without having ornaments on, that furnished the amplest occupation to the goldsmith and the jeweller. Some of the ladies decorated their whole person with ornaments. Those who could not afford to have pure gold ornaments had to be satisfied with those made of an inferior kind of gold alloyed with an inferior metal. Beyond a general mention of the alaṃkāras Vātsyāyana does not name other ornaments than rings which are very frequently referred to as tokens of love presented by lovers to each other.¹ The Lalitavistara mentions a ring worth several lacs and a pearl necklace that was worth many times that sum. Cārudatta's wife also had a pearl necklace given to her by her parents worth a lac.² The testing of jewels and coins (rupya-ratna-parīkṣā) was a useful art in this community and Vātsyayana knows a Vaikaṭika, a diamond-cutter, whose craft was to purify or refine precious stones.³ Plates and other vessels made of the precious metals, gold and silver, are mentioned by Vātsyāyana and were evidently often used in the houses of the rich while those made of the baser metals, copper, bell-metal or iron, were used by ordinary people; moreover, vessels made of earth, split-bamboo, wood and skins were in very general use.⁴

Besides the jeweller, the goldsmith and the diamond-cutter, the dyer of clothes (rañjaka) also was an artisan who appears to have access to the inner apartments of the nāgaraka's house and to take orders from the ladies direct. Blue and orange (colour of the kusumbha flower) seem to be the dyes most fashionable; the dyer is by preference called the nīlīkusumbhārañjaka. The yellow dye was also perhaps generally used, though the dye obtained from turmeric (haridrā) provides a proverbial expression for denoting fickle, impermanent affection.⁵ Sundarī, Nanda's beloved wife, is described as weaving a garment of the colour of the ruby (padmarāga) which is no doubt the same as the kusumbha colour of Vātsyāyana, and in the Buddhacarita a lady is represented as wearing a blue dress.¹ Earlier still, these very same dyes appear to have been in favour. The noble Licchavi youths who went out of Vesālī to pay their respects to the great Buddha are described in the Mahāvagga as wearing blue, red and yellow robes besides white ones ; the same work enumerates a number of other colours being used by people living in the enjoyments of the world, though even there the blue, yellow and red are given the first place.² The economic housewife is described by Vātsyāyana as getting the rejected clothes of her husband cleaned and redyed and then presenting them to the servants.³

A number of artisans are mentioned by Vātsyāyana as helping the nāgaraka in the decoration of his person and thus in his quest of love, and are spoken of by Vātsyāyana as his friends: among them we find in the first place, the florist who looks after his flowerbeds, who makes garlands for his neck and chaplets for his head, and who helps him in preparing floral decorations for presentation to his beloved.⁴ Next comes the perfumer (saugandhika) whom, as we have seen, he patronised very liberally. Then we have the goldsmith, the betel-leaf-seller, as also the washerman, the barber and the wine-seller. The women folk of these artisans were also regarded by him as his friends (mitrāṇī).⁵ This establishment of friendly relations between the wealthy nāgaraka and the craftsman appears to indicate a great respect for the crafts which are nowhere in Vātsyāyana spoken of as implying any inferior rank or position.

THE POSITION OF THE GAṆIKĀS

In the age of Vātsyāyana, the Gaṇikā, or the educated and accomplished woman about the town, occupied a peculiar position. Though belonging to the class of "public women," still she appears to have been treated with special consideration. But it was not every courtesan that received this appellation: it was only when a woman of this class was marked out by high intellectual attainments, and striking pre-eminence in the arts that she won the coveted title of gaṇikā. She must have her mind cultivated and trained by a thorough education (śāstraprahatabuddhiḥ) and Vātsyāyana lays down that it is only when a courtesan is versed in both the series of sixty-four arts or kalās enumerated by him and is endowed with an amiable disposition, personal charms and other winning qualities, that she acquires the designation of a gaṇikā and receives a seat of honour in the assemblies of men. She is always honoured by the king and is highly lauded by men qualified to appreciate merit; her favours and company are sought for, and she becomes, in fact, the observed of all observers, a model and pattern for all.¹ In the Lalitavistara, king Śuddhodana desires for the young Siddhārtha a bride who was as much learned in the śāstras and as accomplished in the arts as a gaṇikā.² Bharata's Nāṭyaśāstra, which is a work of the same period, speaks equally, if not more, enthusiastically, about the excellences of the gaṇikā. Bharata describes her as one who knows the practical application of various arts, who possesses a deep knowledge of many of the sciences (śāstras), who is skilled in the sixty-four kalās and in dancing to the accompaniment of music, whose conduct is marked by respect towards superiors, by graceful and engaging manners, by charming gestures and sweet blandishments; who possessed strength and firmness of mind and at the same time modesty and a sweetness of temper; who is free from the characteristic defects of women; who speaks gracefully and clearly; who is clever in work and does not get tired—a woman possessed of all these rare qualities and accomplishments would be called a gaṇikā.¹ That she was regarded by Bharata as a woman of great education and culture appears from the fact that the gaṇikā, when introduced as a character in a drama, is, according to him, to speak Sanskrit.² The uses to which the gaṇikā puts her money are also characterised by a desire for public good and her charity shows the noble tendencies of her cultured mind. The gaṇikās of the highest class, says Vātsyāyana, consider it as the highest gain to themselves when they receive sufficient money to spend on the building of temples, excavation of tanks, planting of gardens, erection of bridges and of houses for sacrifice and ceremonies or the institution of permanent arrangements for the worship of the gods. They valued very highly any chance of giving away cows to Brāhmanas, of course through a third person, because no Brāhmaṇa would accept anything from a courtesan.³

The gaṇikā literally appears to mean a woman who is the member of a gaṇa or corporation, whose charms are the common poetry of the whole body of men associated together by a common bond, economic or political. Manu associates the gaṇa and the gaṇikā in one verse saying that the food offered by both were equally to be refused by a Brahmin.¹ The gaṇa might be a corporation of citizens, the nāgarika-jana-samavāya of Vātsyāyana, like the one to which our nāgaraka belonged, or it might be a political body like that of the Licchavis of Vaiśālī whose gaṇikā, Ambapālikā, was a glory of their capital and was credited with all the virtues and qualities contemplated by Vātsyāyana and Bharata, thus testifying that their definitions were not fanciful and imaginary. We read in the Mahāvagga that she was charming, attractive, graceful, possessed of a fine and tender complexion, generous, and proficient in dancing, song and music. The wealth and power that the gaṇikā of Vaiśālī possessed and the position that she occupied, were in no way inferior to those of the best of the proud Licchavis; her train was as numerous and as sumptuously decorated, her carriages were as magnificent as those of the Licchavis against whom she drove up axle to axle, wheel to wheel, and yoke to yoke. Her presence made the city of Vaiśālī shine forth in great splendour and glory. She constituted, as it were, a valued institution of the city, the high model of beauty and art thus set up by the gaṇikā of Vesālī roused a merchant of the rival city of Rājagaha to induce king Bimbisāra to have this institution of gaṇikā in his own capital which suffered in this respect in comparison with the chief city of the gaṇarājya or republic of the Licchavis.² It shows that in those early times gaṇikās were not so numerous as they became in Vātsyāyana's days. But we observe that in the days of Kātyāyana, the author of the Vārttika-sūtras of the grammatical school of Pāṇini, there were already guilds of gaṇikās (gāṇikyam), as explained in the Mahābhāṣya, just as we read of the ganikā-saṅgha in Vātsyāyana.¹

We may also note the fact that Buddha excludes from his fold the eunuch and the hermaphrodite, but not the ganikā, who does not appear to have been looked upon as a moral outcaste past redemption. The Buddhist religious books have hardly anything to say against Ambapālīkā, the courtesan of Vaiśālī, nor do they suggest that there was anything peculiar or out of the way in the favour that Buddha showed towards her. Reading the Vinaya-Piṭaka we are indeed astonished to see how careful and anxious the Buddha was in order not to offend public opinion and to give a decent and respectable appearance to his congregation. He thought it disreputable and exceedingly revolting to the sense of common decency of the people to harbour sinners like the parricide or the matricide, but apparently he experienced no difficulty in ordaining a courtesan who had reformed herself; he could take her in without causing a shock to the moral susceptibilities of the people and in fact some of the noble sisters (theris), whose inspired songs have been compiled in the Therīgāthā, had reformed their life which before ordination was not quite above reproach.

The position that the ganikā enjoyed may be explained by the fact that in a society characterised by æsthetic refinement as was that of the age of Vātsyāyana, women who possessed special proficiency in the arts were respected for the value of their art, and their company was sought for by all lovers of art; the long training and education needed for the acquisition of such literary and artistic accomplishments as the ganikā possessed, could not be obtained by a girl who was married and had to manage a household, especially as she was married rather early, though Vātsyāyana's chapter on courtship shows that many of them remained unmarried even after puberty. Moreover, it was certainly not considered decent for such a girl to attend the public schools of art or gāndharva śālās, where the daughters of the gaṇikās received lessons in the arts, and formed, as Vātsyāyana says, acquaintance with the sons of the wealthy citizens;¹ nor could any but very wealthy parents afford to give their daughters such education at home. Where the parents were very rich, as in the case of the daughters of princes and high officials, they did receive, as we have seen before, a thorough education in the arts and sciences. Gopā was as learned and clever as any gaṇikā, as the Lalitavistara says. Then again, the wedded wife, on account of her manifold duties in the household, could not cultivate the arts as thoroughly as she would like to; besides, the great regard for purity in the married woman and the strict and rigid rules that guided her conduct even in the age of Vātsyāyana, prohibited, as we have seen above, her receiving lessons in the arts except from her own husband. We see, therefore, that the gaṇikās, like the Hetæreæ in the Athens of Pericles, were generally more educated and better skilled in the arts than the married women, and the nāgarakas, though they had devoted wives at home, as the ideal of a wife drawn by Vātsyāyana shows, were attracted by the intellectual and artistic qualities of the educated gaṇikā. Such a noble soul as Bhāsa's Cārudatta, though he had a devoted wife at home, who was ready to sacrifice the last bit of her personal property for his sake and for whom he himself had a great regard, had no scruple in falling in love with the actress Vasantasenā, and the Mṛcchakaṭika makes him even marry her.² With such ideals of the devoted wife as we have in Vātsyāyana and in Bhāsa's Cāru-datta, it cannot be said with any sound reason that the nāgaraka sought the company of the ganikā because his life at home was miserable or unbearable, but evidently he was drawn by her accomplishments. Even the general public, though they despised her for the life she led, tolerated her on account of her high artistic qualifications which they found many occasions to enjoy and appreciate at the prekṣaṇakas or performances at the festive assemblies (samājas) such as we have described above.

CONCLUSION

We have thus seen that the nagaraka was a man of considerable intellectual culture and æsthetic refinement, but at the same time he was not very scrupulous with regard to sexual morality. He is the product of an age when wealth and riches were flowing into India through an extensive commerce with the east and the west and the picture that the Kāmasūtra furnishes of his life also shows the virtues and vices characteristic of such an age. In the first place we observe that this materialistic prosperity had led to the formation in the country of materialistic ideals that made more of the comforts of the world than of dharma or the life of discipline. There are people, says Vātsyāyana, who hold that the *dharma*s should not be practised, in as much as the fruits of such practice,—the rewards for these austerities, are only prospective, and moreover they are doubtful and uncertain at the best ; who but a fool would give away to others, what he has in his own hands, in the hope of some future gain ? Better a dove to-day than a peacock to-morrow. Better a copper token (kāṣāpaṇa) that is certain than a piece of sterling gold—a niṣka—the acquisition of which is doubtful. Vātsyāyana, of course, combats these ideas, but it shows that the materialistic ideals of pleasure are there in the country, though limited only to a small section of the people, mostly to the Laukāyatikas or materialists.¹

It must not be imagined, however, that the age in which Vātsyāyana lived was as a whole an age of gross materialism or that the whole of Indian society at the time bore this character ; it will be a mistake to suppose that the nagaraka's easy morality was even a main feature of the character of the majority of the people. In the first place, Vātsyāyana paints in his nāgaraka the picture of a particular and limited section of the dwellers in cities. A nāgaraka is a wealthy person who has received a liberal education in youth and has already earned a competence by inheritance or by personal endeavour, so that he can afford to lead the life of comfort and pleasure in a city. The class which he represents has lived in all ages and in all countries wherever economic prosperity has enabled a section of the people to command and enjoy the good things of the earth. His counterpart is not wanting in our modern days in countries which are rich in material wealth and where the people "enjoy life." He can be traced with but few changes, and these only in details, in the salons of Paris and Vienna, of London and Berlin. In India itself, his successors, though not absolutely extinct, are but few, for the good reason that the abundance of material riches and the consequent joys of life out of which the nāgaraka could grow, have departed from this country.

1 न धर्मायुजेत् । एष्यतफलत्वात् । साशयिकत्वाच्च । कोऽद्यवालिङ्गो हस्तगत परगतं कुर्यात् । वरमद्य कपोतः श्वी मयूरात्, वर साशयिकान्निष्कादसाशयिकः काषापण इति लौकायतिकाः ।—Ibid, p. 19 (sūtras 25-30).

Then, again, we observe that the character of the matron was marked by firmness and purity, modesty and restraint, showing that the general ideals of society as regards sexual purity had not been lowered since the age of the Dharmasutras. In fact it is apparent from what Vātsyāyana says, that the main current of social life had not undergone much transformation and that the ideals set up in the Dharma-codes still controlled society. He asserts that the whole structure of society is upheld and maintained by the observance of the principle of the division of the people into varṇas or classes and into āśramas or stages of life. In this society a man does not marry until he has finished his education ; after marrying he lives the life of a good citizen and brings up a family, and in advanced years, retires from worldly activities and devotes himself exclusively to matters spiritual. The Brāhmanas among the four classes were highly respected, their blessings being considered as conducive to long life and glory.¹ Respect for the Vedas and the other Holy scriptures is insisted upon ; it is declared that there is no room for doubting the validity of their teachings : in matters relating to life in this world, which can produce visible effects, one has to guide oneself in accordance with the ordinances of the Sacred Codes, and in matters relating to the life beyond and producing effects beyond the physical vision of man, one is also guided by the prescriptions of Holy Writ such as the performance of sacrifices and similar other observances. It is declared that the authority of the sacred scriptures is binding with regard to dharma or the principles of right conduct which have to be learned from Śruti, or the Vedas, and also from the assembly of men proficient in them.²

Vedic sacrifices still appear to have constituted an important feature of the religious exercises of the people ; along with other common occurrences of life sacrifices are mentioned by Vātsyāyana as occasions which permitted a gathering of people of both sexes and we are told that even the virtuous matron could attend such assemblies with the permission of her husband. The erection of sacrificial altars and houses, formed one of the most earnest desires of women, nay even of the courtesans. Sacrifices formed an indispensable part of the ceremony of marriage, which, if once performed in the presence of fire, i. e., with sacrifices, could never be repudiated ; this is declared as the rule upheld by all teachers and throughout his chapter on courtship and marriage, Vātsyayana advises a young lover, again and again, to ratify his marriage with the maiden of his love with sacrifices in the fire brought from the house of a śrotriya, i. e. a man who keeps up the sacrificial fire constantly burning in his house and daily offers oblations in it. A person initiated for sacrifice (dīkṣita) is also mentioned along with persons who have taken certain vows or have assumed the marks of certain sects of ascetics.¹ This makes it abundantly clear that the sacrifices laid down in the grhya sutras still held a prominent place in the life of the period when Vātsyāyana lived and here he is corroborated by epigraphic evidence. The inscriptions in Western India of the early centuries of the Christian era show that sacrifices on a large scale were performed at the time and munificent gifts were made to Bhiksus and Brāhmanas even by persons of foreign extraction like Uṣabhadāta. Vātsyayana speaks of a thousand cows given away to Brāhmanas. Moreover the daily performance of bali-karma at the *nāgaraka*s under the supervision of his wife shows the unabated influence of the grhyasūtras.² Then again, the nāgaraka, though a pleasure-seeker, was a worshipper of the gods. We have already referred to the niche at the head of his bed for holding an image of the iṣṭa devatā or the deity to whom he was particularly devoted and also to the daily worship of the gods at the household temple. Moreover, he, and specially his wife, took part in fasts and observances whose number was apparently not insignificant. Besides, we have seen, how at regular, as well as irregular, intervals the public took part in grand religious festivals (ghaṭā) often accompanied by processions of images and attended by men and women in large numbers. Even a courtesan considered it as the greatest happiness of her life (lābhātīśaya) to institute arrangements for the worship of the gods.¹ All these facts go to prove that religious observances played a great part in the life of the people in Vātsyāyana's time, and that the Code of Manu had at the time acquired its full authority over the public mind as is shown by Vātsyāyana who speaks of Svāyambhuva Manu as the person who had taken up the Dharma section of Prajāpati's all-embracing encyclopædia and dealt with it in a separate treatise. Besides, Yājñavalkya's great code, second in importance to Manu alone, is supposed to have been composed about the time when Vātsyāyana lived.²

It was in this period, again, that Mahāyāna Buddhism grew and spread, and it must be admitted that the literature of the Mahāyāna school bears on its face the impress of this age of æsthetic refinement and culture. Its great preacher, Aśvaghoṣa, sought to popularise his faith by writing dramas and magnificent poetical works instead of works on dry dialectics and abstruse theology. The few fragments that we possess of Aśvaghoṣa's dramas, Śāriputraprakaraṇa and others, show that in at least one of them the ganikā played almost as important a part as in Bhāsa's Cārudatta, and that too in a work where Buddha himself makes his appearance with some of his dearest disciples. Asvaghosa was in the first place a theologian and a dialectician as his Vajrasuci would go to prove, but in an age of great æsthetic culture, he had to adapt himself to the refined tastes of his audience and so he sweetened the tasteless doses of his dry theological doctrines with the honey of poetry and music, and he knew how to mix the ingredients with all the skill of a master. The Lalitavistara also has succeeded eminently in combining intense love and reverence for the Master with poetic skill and grace. The Divyāvadāna and the Mahāvastu also appear to have received, at least, some additions in this era of kathās and akhyānas of which we find a frequent mention in Vātsyāyana.¹

In the next place, we gather from the philosophical literature of the age in which Vātsyāyana lived, that it was one of intense philosophical speculation. Nagarjuna in the second century A. D. had established his Sunyarada or Philosophic Nihilism and he was followed by a string of great logicians of his school. His success roused to activity all the orthodox schools of philosophy the representatives of which proceeded to compose new works, to write extensive commentaries on the already existing texts, or at any rate to bring their systems up to date by fresh additions calculated to combat successfully the new school that was gradually acquiring strength and volume. Whether we do or do not accept the conclusion of Prof Jacobi that the Nyāyadarśana and the Brahmasūtra were originally composed between 200 and 450 A.D., we have less reason to doubt him when he assigns to this period the old commentators, Vātsyāyana, Upavarsa and Baudhāyana (the Vṛttikāra) who were all working to bring their respective systems in line with the new ideas originated by Buddhist thinkers. Even the author of the Kāmasūtra has shown the prevailing tendency of the time by defining his general concepts and discussing the current theories about them in the approved philosophical method, and he has approached his subject with the detachment of a scientific observer and the analytic skill of a subtle logician. Moreover, we must not forget that in the period embraced by the first four centuries of the Christian era, the Mahābhārata was receiving the final form in which we possess it now.¹

There can be no doubt, then, that this age of great philosophical discovery and analysis, the age that produced the Lalitavistara and the code of Yājñavalkya, could not have been marked by a general low tone in moral life. The age to be studied as a whole requires a study of all sides of the Indian civilisation of the time based on a far ampler stock of materials than only Vātsyāyana can supply. Vātsyāyana's work deals with only one aspect of it and shows that his was an age of great intellectual activity in all directions, and the great thinker makes an analysis of the erotic feelings and of the elementary relations between the sexes in a right scientific spirit : in doing so he naturally turned for illustration to the class that had cultivated this side of the humanistics for centuries, at least since the time of Pāṇini, to whom as we have seen, the nāgaraka was a familiar character. Vātsyāyana does not cast a charm over illicit love, nor does he invest it with the halo of romance. He merely gives a frank and matter of fact account of the social sore, proceeds to a masterly analysis of the psychology of the man who seeks such love—the jealousy, anger, hatred, passion, greed, selfishness that working within the brain of the human animal, cloud his judgment and pervert his tastes. He points out categorically that a scientific work (śāstra), dealing with a subject as a whole, must be exhaustive, but that is no reason why a particular practice described in it should be carried into effect; for example, the taste, the properties and the digestive qualities of dog's flesh are given in medical works, but that is no reason why it should be adopted as an article of diet by sober men.¹ He winds up his thesis by saying, "whenever, on account of the character of the subject dealt with, I had to speak about things that might smack of lust and desire, I have taken care immediately afterwards to censure and condemn them", and he adds that, he himself had followed the strictly pure life of a brahmacārin and had been deeply immersed in contemplation (samādhi) while composing the work for the benefit of the world and not for feeding the flames of desire. The ideal of life that he holds up, is that of harmonious blending of the three elements—dharma, artha and kāma—which sum up according to Indian ideas all human motives of action for the people of the world. He enjoins that a rightminded person should occupy himself with such actions as, while giving pleasure (kāma), do not stand in the way of the acquisition of the good things of the earth (artha), and at the same time do not disregard the behests of dharma, that is, as he explains, do not afford any ground for the fear of their being followed by evil effects hereafter. This is the same as the teaching of the Bhagavadgītā that God dwells in such desires as do not violate dharma. Vātsyāyana thus emphasises the working out of the threefold functions of man (trivarga) in such a way that there may be no conflict among these three, while he is not unmindful of the fourth or final good of mankind, viz., mokṣa,¹ the ultimate release from the limitations that curb the eternal growth of his soul.
